A young man by the name of McGowan, an entire stranger to everybody in the crowded smoking compartment of the sleeping car, where several gentlemen were sitting and others standing, undertook to testify to everything that was said during a two hours' ride on that train; and not only that, but to testify to everything that was not said. That is to say, this witness testified that notwithstanding the noise of the train, notwithstanding the fact that the smoking compartment of the car was crowded with men engaged in general conversation, notwithstanding the fact the he had never before seen a single man there and had never seen any of them afterwards, save one, he could not only testify to the conversation that occurred but he could testify to the precise location of every man in the compartment, could tell when each man entered, and when each man left, and swore that it would have been impossible for Wiehe to have mentioned LORIMER's name without his hearing it.

I did not believe that story. It was regarded by me as not only improbable but utterly incredible. So, when there was brought forward the testimony of the Burns detectives as to how they had trapped this man, how they had induced him to admit that his testimony here was perjury, I paid no attention to it. That is to say, I did not attend the hearing when the detective witnesses were on the stand, because I felt that it was a waste of time to listen to testimony in rebuttal of evidence like McGowan's, which was so utterly incredible. The detective testified to the facts I have stated—that McGowan had admitted to him that his testimony was perjury, and that testimony I shall not review.

But Mr. McGowan himself admitted, in the closing days of the hearings, that he had written a letter to the detective, Bailey, and it was that letter for which I was just now looking. I will give the substance of it.

It was that after testifying in Washington last summer in this hearing he went to his place of business in Canada; that he found he had lost some money by reason of his absence here in Washington attending the hearing; that he demanded reimbursement from Mr. Hines or Mr. Wiehe or the Hines Lumber Co. The detective testified that McGowan told him he was going to make them "come across" on account of the perjury he had committed for them; that if they did not "come across" he would expose them.

The letter which he afterwards wrote the detective, and the genuineness of which he admits, says, referring to the Hines Lumber Co., "I made them come across, not for as much as I hoped, but I had a hell of a time in getting what I did," or words to that effect, corroborating the statement of the detective that his testimony was perjury, and corroborating the idea that he was paid this money as hush money to prevent an exposure, his testimony in the first instance having been false.

One or two words more, Mr. President, and I think I shall have finished. I wanted, before sitting down, to say something about the relationship existing between the Senator from Illinois and Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne. If there was no connection between them, then much of what I have said is of no weight. Speaking of their relationship, Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne testifies very fully and very plainly.

I read from Senator LORIMER's testimony because in it is incorporated the testimony of Lee O'Neil Browne. These were questions asked by myself:

Senator KERN. I want to ask you something about the activities of Lee O'Neil Browne in your behalf, and the conferences you had with him. I call your attention to Mr. Browne's testimony, on page 4894, where he testified to a promise which he says he exacted from Mr. Shurtleff and yourself concerning the roll call, which I imagine was that there should not be a roll call for you until you had enough votes to elect:

"Senator KENYON. Then when did you exact it from Mr. Lorimer?—Speaking of the promise to which I have just referred.

"Mr. BROWNE. Just as soon as I had any conversation with him in regard to the matter, which was shortly after I saw Mr. Shurtleff—very shortly, because the conferences relative to that campaign commenced to take place in those rooms very shortly after my telling Mr. Shurtleff what I would do.

"Senator KENYON. Did you frequently meet Mr. LORIMER there?

"Mr. BROWNE. Oh, yes; every night, and sometimes there would be half a dozen conferences in the night, the same as there are in any campaign.

"The CHAIRMAN. In the speaker's rooms in the hotel?

"Mr. BROWNE. Yes, sir."

Then, again, on page 4912, a question by myself:

"Senator KERN. I see that your testimony then given was to the effect that 'from that time on the conferences were at night mostly—every night during the stay at Springfield,' and that they lasted sometimes for some hours and sometimes there were a dozen of then in an evening?

"Mr. BROWNE. Yes, sir.

"Senator KERN. And that at those meetings you kept Senator LORIMER posted as to your movements in reference to his candidacy, and that you and Mr. Shurtleff kept each other posted, 'just as any other campaign committee would do?'

"Mr. BROWNE. That is substantially correct.

"Senator KERN. Then those were very busy days and nights there, pushing his candidacy?

"Mr. BROWNE. Yes, sir; all the days and nights down there had been very busy.

"Senator KERN. But at the time I speak of now, when you were holding a dozen conferences in one night, that would be a busy time?

"Mr. BROWNE. Yes; I presume there were evenings when there would be what you might call one long conference entered into, or you might say a dozen separate ones.

"Senator KERN. What would be the purpose of a dozen conferences in one evening? How would that contingency arise?

"Mr. BROWNE. An endeavor to ascertain accurately how some one member or members stood, about whom there would be some doubt.

"Senator KERN. Yes. That is to say, when a question would come up about a member you or some one would go and see the man?

"Mr. BROWNE. Or have some one else go; some one who would see the member.

"Senator KERN. And then you would have another meeting to find out the result of that effort?

"Mr. BROWNE. He would come back and report; yes.

"Senator KERN. You told Mr. LORIMER, during this period, as to just what you were doing toward furthering his canvass?

"Mr. BROWNE. Yes; in a general way.

"Senator KERN. And you went over the list with him?

"Mr. BROWNE. Oh, as I have told you, I probably did frequently, in part. I do not think I ever went over the entire list."

I want to ask you if that accords with your recollection as to what Mr. Browne and other members were doing?

Senator LORIMER. I should say, substantially, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.). Evidently the Senator from Indiana is very much fatigued. He has not been well. I request that he be permitted to resume his speech to-morrow. He informs me that he can finish in about half an hour.

Mr. KERN. It will take me a very short time to conclude. I expected to finish this evening, but I have been indisposed for some days, and I find the effort this afternoon has exhausted me.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator has yielded the floor for the time being.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Notice will be entered that the Senator from Indiana will proceed with his remarks to-morrow after the morning business.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate take up House bill 24023, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. In the meantime, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Curtis	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Bacon	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bourne	du Pont	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Gallinger	Overman	Smoot
Bristow	Gore	Page	Stephenson
Bryan	Heyburn	Percy	Sutherland
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thornton
Catron	Jones	Poindexter	Tillman
Clapp	Kern	Pomerene	Townsend
Crawford	Lodge	Reed	Warren
Culberson	Lorimer	Shively	Wetmore
Cullom	McCumber	Simmons	Williams
Cummins	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT RICHFORD, VT.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to have the attention of the Senate for just a moment while I ask unanimous consent to have a very small bill passed. It is the bill (S. 6899) increasing the limit of cost for the erection and completion of a public building in the city of Richford, State of Vermont. The bill has received a favorable report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I should like to have it passed this afternoon if I can.

Mr. WARREN. I understand it to be somewhat of an emergency matter and a very short measure. If it does not lead to any debate I am willing to yield for that purpose.

Mr. PAGE. If there is any objection to it I will withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to increase the limit of cost for a public building in the city of Richford, State of Vermont, authorized under section 4 of the act of May 30, 1908, from $60,000 to $74,000, and appropriates $14,000 to provide for such increased cost.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the legislative appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee, on pages 34 and 35, which has been read.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that the amendment, on pages 34 and 35, has been read in full, and an amendment offered to the amendment has been carried. I now ask for the adoption of the amended amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I made a suggestion, when we were considering this amendment a day or two ago, and I hope the Senator from Wyoming will agree to that suggestion. Possibly he has forgotten it.

Mr. WARREN. No; if the Senator will allow me, what I understand the Senator from Iowa to want to do is to strike out the language commencing on line 22, page 34, with the word "and," and to strike out the balance of that line and all of line 23 up to the word "any."

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I wish to repeat that I have no objection to the employment of these persons in the Department of State. I do not know whether they are necessary or not, but I assume that the committee has fully investigated that question, and I accept the judgment of the committee with regard to the necessity of these employees.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator, but I supposed those were the words he wanted to have stricken out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to strike out beginning with the word "and," in line 22, on page 34, down to and including the word "relations," in line 2, page 35, and then after the word "with," in line 7, page 35, to insert the words "the work of the department," striking out all the portion in italics after the word "with."

Mr. WARREN. That is more than I understood the Senator to want. I understood that he wished to strike out the definition commencing where he commenced the words "and to be employed upon tariff, treaty, and trade relations and negotiations." The committee would have no objection to striking that out if that would suit the Senator. I do not think we should strike out so much as the Senator has now indicated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not object to Congress creating four additional divisions, one for the far east and one for Latin America and one for the near east or Europe, but I do not want to create those departments in an appropriation bill if they are not already created.

Mr. WARREN. They are already created, only they were created, as most of these places are, in an appropriation bill, and are in the current law.

Mr. CUMMINS. If that be true, and I do not doubt it——

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to correct the Senator from Wyoming right there. While they were carried forward in the appropriation bill, they were created by the Secretary of State from a lump sum. That was the original creation.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is going back, say, four or five years ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was done in the tariff act, and that was not four or five years ago.

Mr. WARREN. Each year they have been provided for.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the appropriation of $100,000 was authorized in the tariff act.

Mr. WARREN. That was in 1909, and it is now 1912. It was four years ago, and the appropriation was $75,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Three years ago.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Iowa had not concluded.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to say that while I agreed with what was said the other day respecting the creation of offices under the act of 1909, yet it has been done, as I understand it, and I do not know enough about the subject to ask that it be undone. Therefore I will be content if the words "and to be employed upon tariff, treaty, and trade relations and negotiations" be stricken out of that part of the amendment and the words I have already indicated be inserted and the other language in italics stricken out on page 35.

Mr. WARREN. As to the first, I shall be glad to accept the amendment, but as to the second I do not think I can accept it. Perhaps I do not understand it. Where does the Senator commence? On what line?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would read in this way:

For meeting occasional and unforeseen expenses arising in connection with the work of the department, $25,340.

I do not know that that is a proper sum or not. I assume that the committee has investigated that and I am not sufficiently familiar with the matter to controvert it, but I do oppose putting in the words:

For meeting occasional and unforeseen expenses arising in connection with foreign trade relations which come within the jurisdiction of the Department of State under tariff legislation and otherwise, and in the negotiation and preparation of treaties, arrangements, and agreements for the advancement of commercial and other interests, including the appointment of necessary employees at the seat of government or otherwise, to be selected and compensated under the provisions of the act of August 5, 1909.

If we have given by any legislation heretofore the authority to the Department of State—and I assume we have—to enter upon negotiations with foreign nations concerning these things, I do not protest; but I do not think that we ought to enlarge that power, whatever it may be, in the appropriation bill.

I do not know precisely what the committee had in mind in describing this work in the manner in which it has described it. The latter part of the proposed amendment refers to the act of 1909. The only authority that was given in that act for the expenditure of any money whatsoever, or the only basis that was laid for an appropriation, is contained in the last sentence of the first paragraph on page 81 of the tariff act, which says:

To secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section, and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required.

The only authority is to the President to employ such persons as may be required to do the work that is there indicated. Now, the committee says in this amendment:

Including the appointment of necessary employees at the seat of government or otherwise, to be selected and compensated under the provisions of the act of August 5, 1909.

That would seem to substitute for the President of the United States the Secretary of State, and to authorize him to employ such persons as he might deem best to execute the tariff law; and I can not think that the committee intended power or authority in that matter to be transferred in that way.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but certainly he is wide of what the committee intends and wide of the real facts in the case as to what has happened since.

As I explained the other day, it was the sum of $75,000 and not $100,000, in the first place. The work was done under that original language. A year afterwards in an appropriation bill different language was used and a different amount was named, and precisely these duties were provided which are now contained in this measure.

The committee in considering this matter proposed first to settle the question, Does the Department of State require these men to perform the duties which they are now doing? A careful investigation, in which we had the Secretary of State and several assistants with us, developed very plainly that if we were to sustain the position of the Government in a proper manner with foreign countries and advance these relations that have already been growing in importance relatively, they not only need the officers now but would undoubtedly continue to need them.

So instead of bunching them in exactly as it was last year we put them in with the others in the statutory way. In the latter part of the amendment which the Senator has read we used the exact language that has been current, the language in the last law and in, I think, at least one law before then. I have it here, if the Senator would like to know what it was.

Mr. CUMMINS. If we had it so in the last law, it was wrong, and it ought not to be perpetuated.

Mr. WARREN. That is another matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. WARREN. It is useless to say that we are acting upon the original $75,000 appropriation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us see if we fully understand each other. When we passed the act of 1909 it was urged that a board ought to be created, first, for the purpose of assisting the President in applying the law to the new condition, which was the creation of a maximum and a minimum tariff schedule, and, second, that we ought to authorize the President to employ suitable persons to make an investigation concerning the cost of production at home and abroad.

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I will yield in a moment to the Senator from Georgia.

That, as Senators will remember, was a suggestion made that it was thought would take the place of the Tariff Board that was being urged by some of us upon this side of the Chamber, and notably by the then Senator from Indiana. When the bill was reported, however, it had dwindled into an authority to the President to employ certain person or persons to apply this law, and there was no suggestion with regard to the acquisition of information. There was no thought of interposing the Department of State as one of the preliminaries to the revision or change of a tariff schedule, and the act gave that power only to the President.

Now, if some subsequent act transferred that power to the Department of State it was erroneously transferred. Congress never intended that the Tariff Board should act under the direction of the Department of State. It was bad enough to put it completely under the power of the President of the United States.

That was a course which never met my approval. I think there is still the same demand for an independent Tariff Board, responsible to Congress alone. But we did commit the power finally to the President of the United States to employ these people, and he did employ them with increased appropriations from year to year. I have nothing to say against their work. In the main, I think it has been exceedingly well done and will be very helpful as time goes on. But what we propose to do here is to give that power to the Secretary of State to the extent of the appropriation that is here permitted.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Georgia. I wanted to finish that thought.

Mr. BACON. I simply wanted to see if I am correct in my recollection that when this matter was before the Senate in 1909 the provision as it originally came before the Senate did contemplate some enlarged functions on the part of those who were to be employed, looking to general information in regard to tariff matters. If I am correct in my recollection the then Senator from Maine, Mr. Hale, was very explicit when the provision was changed so as to limit to the performance of the duty which would devolve upon the President strictly to the maximum and minimum provision of the tariff. Questions were propounded to him which brought from him the statement that it was the purpose to exclude everything else. Am I correct? Does the Senator remember it?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia is entirely correct.

Mr. BACON. Really the purpose for which I rose before, and I would not have done so but the Senator was dividing the two functions to be performed, was to ask the Senator whether he understands that there is still a necessity under the maximum and minimum provision in the tariff law for power to the President to employ any person for that purpose, or whether that is not a function already performed, and not liable again to call for any action on the part of the President. Certainly if so it is an exceptional case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not with any such generality, of course, as existed in 1909, but I think it is true that the power is a continuing one. If the President of the United States were to find that any nation with which we have dealings had begun to discriminate against us it would not only be within his authority, but it would be his duty to recall the proclamation he had theretofore issued and to impose upon that country our maximum duty.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CUMMINS. So it can be said that there is still necessity for some advice and assistance in this direction.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator does not recognize that there is any such probability of an occasion of that kind arising, certainly with any such degree of frequency as to require the appropriation of a large amount for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I would think not.

Mr. BACON. I think it is true that possibly since the first investigations were made under the act of 1909 nothing has occurred which required any additional action on the part of the President, and so far as we can now anticipate it is not probable that there will be any. Of course it is possible.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the Senator from Wyoming to distinctly understand my position. I do not want to limit the power or authority of the Department of State; I want it to exercise all the duties—not, however, contained in an ephemeral appropriation act—that it has been authorized to perform. I recognize the great value of the service that it renders. I do not want to diminish the amount of money that is placed at its disposal; but, on the other hand, I protest against creating new duties or giving new directions to the Department of State in an appropriation bill. I intend, I hope, to maintain that position throughout our appropriation measures.

I am opposed to legislation, of an important character at least, that is not very germane in appropriation bills. I know that once in a while we will do a very good thing by legislating in an appropriation bill; we possibly secure an act that we otherwise could not have secured; but, on the other hand, in the long run we will do more bad things than we will do good things by attempting to govern the country in its general policy through the medium of appropriation bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice that the Senator read a very interesting and valuable document in his tariff speech on the steel schedule by Mr. Charles M. Pepper.

Mr. CUMMINS. I read during one of my addresses a report made by Charles M. Pepper, who was operating at that time as an employee or agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was just going to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that Charles M. Pepper was an employee of the Department of Commerce and Labor, but, as Mr. Nagel says, they have taken from him some of the most valuable men for the State Department, and one of them is Charles M. Pepper, to whom they pay a salary of $4,500. He was working under the Department of Commerce and Labor, and, I think, at that time procured all the valuable data which the Senator used, but now he has been transferred to the State Department under this provision, and he is in charge of that work. I want to inform the Senate that that is one of the things they are doing.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not imagine what objection the Senator from Wyoming can have to this amendment, because it gives the Department of State for expenditure in every way authorized by the law all the sum of money which it is thought necessary for that purpose.

I do not want to take the act of 1909 and give to the Secretary of State or put into the hands of the Department of State the work which was committed to the President under that act. It ought not to be taken away from the President; and I protest against the creation of another agency to deal with the tariff.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will send the Senator another copy of the bill, so that during the debate he may prepare an amendment to the bill in the Senate, if he should conclude to offer one, though I do not very well understand the necessity for it; but I should like the attention of the Senator for a moment.

The province, as I understand, of the Appropriations Committee is to bring here for the consideration of the Senate appropriations under the law, and not to make law. It is true that in another place they are making law and appropriations at the same time; but surely our province is to appropriate under the law, unless we wish to submit changes of law that we consider important, and then the question would arise as to our right to do so. Here we come to a matter of law. These positions are provided for by law, and, if the Senator will permit me, I am going to have the language of the existing law read, which we followed. There have been some changes this year, and, therefore, in order to reduce it somewhat in expense and to reduce it also in the ambiguity of its language, if there be any, we have left out some of the language and some of the money; but the proposition that the Senator has now before him, and which he desires to change, is existing law, and he proposes to change the law in an appropriation act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think this is existing law. The Senator from Wyoming has not yet apprehended the point I am making. I am not objecting to any office; I am not seeking to strike out any part of this bill which creates an office or which makes an appropriation for an office; but you make an appropriation here of $25,340 for "occasional and unforeseen expenses" in the Department of State. I am not objecting to that, because I can well understand how it might be necessary, but I am objecting to the provision which declares that this $25,340 shall be expended under the—

> Department of State under tariff legislation and otherwise, and in the negotiation and preparation of treaties, arrangements, and agreements for the advancement of commercial and other interests, including the appointment of necessary employees at the seat of government or otherwise, to be selected and compensated under the provisions of the said act of August 5, 1909.

That act does not provide for any such expenses; it provides for no officers to be appointed by the Secretary of State and no expenses to be made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. WARREN. It is precisely word for word the current law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator read the current law?

Mr. WARREN. I have read the current law once or twice; and I will read it now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be glad to have it read.

Mr. WARREN. Probably it would be better if the Senator were to read the language as he has it before him, and I will compare it with the language of the existing law as I have it here.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator has before him is the appropriation act.

Mr. WARREN. That is the law. The Senator's salary and all other salaries are provided for in an appropriation act.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be glad to have him read the language.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. I thought the Senator had concluded. I do not desire him to yield.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Iowa asks me to read the language. It is as follows:

> For meeting occasional and unforeseen expenses arising in connection with foreign trade relations which come within the jurisdiction of the Department of State under tariff legislation and otherwise, and in the negotiation and preparation of treaties, arrangements, and agreements for the advancement of commercial and other interests, including the appointment of necessary employees at the seat of government or otherwise, to be selected and compensated under the provisions of the said act of August 5, 1909, $25,340.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assert that that is not law. It was provided in that act that this sum of money should be expended during the coming year for these purposes.

Mr. LODGE. It is the law until the 1st of July.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not objecting to the continuance of expenditures until the 1st of July; but it is not the law for the year after the 1st of July. There are no officers provided for. It simply says the Secretary of State may expend certain sums of money for certain purposes during the year; and we are now trying to find out what the Secretary of State should expend for the coming year. If I object to giving him $25,340 for that purpose, I am surely not seeking to overturn any established law. It was a mistake a year ago, and we ought not to perpetuate it now.

I am perfectly willing that he shall have the money, and that he shall expend it for any purpose within the authority of the law or within the scope of the duties of the Secretary of State; but I am not willing, as I said before, to attach him to the act of 1909.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is entirely correct about this matter. I called attention to it in committee at the time when this amendment was being considered. I presume this amendment at pages 34 and 35 was prepared at the State Department. When it was presented to the full committee there were three places in which the words were inserted "under the provisions of the said act of August 5, 1909." On page 34 that provision was stricken out in two instances, but for some reason it was not stricken out on page 35. So we have an appropriation bill in the present instance providing that certain appointees are to be selected and compensated under the provisions of the act of August 5, 1909, when the provisions of the appropriation bill are in contravention of the act of August 5, 1909, for the simple reason that the act of 1909 provides that the appointments shall be made by the President, whereas this appropriation bill and the appropriation bill of a year ago provided that they should be made by the Secretary of State; that is, in two or three instances.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa that all reference to the act of August 5, 1909, ought either to be stricken out of this bill or that the provisions ought to be made to accord with the act of 1909, so that the appointments shall be made by the President instead of by the Secretary of State.

There is another objection to this provision, Mr. President, unless it can be cleared up to my mind, and that is——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I hope the Senator will let me conclude. I shall take but a few moments. It occurs to me, although I am not entirely satisfied about it, that this amendment provides for a duplication of work in our foreign relations. I call attention to the provisions of the bill on page 136, beginning in line 9, and following, under the head of "Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce":

> Chief of bureau, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $4,000; assistant chiefs of bureau, one at $3,000, one at $2,750—

And so on down the line, there being an appropriation made for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce under the Department of Commerce and Labor, when the same character of work is provided for in the Senate committee amendment on pages 34 and 35 in this appropriation bill.

Mr. President, to show that I am not entirely wrong in my suspicion about the duplication of this work, I call the Senate's attention to a paragraph of the letter from the Secretary of State to the Committee on Appropriations, of date May 25, 1912, in which he says, writing to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]:

> When I had the pleasure of appearing before your subcommittee day before yesterday you were good enough to suggest that, owing to the impression of a duplication of work between the Department of State and the Department of Commerce and Labor, I should confer with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and with the President, in order that you might be given such explanations or suggestions by me as would enable the committee to carry out its purpose of eliminating duplications, if any important ones were found to exist while at the same time conserving and strengthening the machinery for the promotion of our great foreign trade.
> I have had a conversation with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, but Mr. Nagel showed a reluctance to address himself to the subject in so far as it passed the direct concern of his own department.

So I suggest, Mr. President, to the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge that this amendment of the Senate committee ought not to be adopted if there is in fact a substantial duplication of the work, first by the State Department and then by the Department of Commerce and Labor, as indicated by the letter of the Secretary of State and by the provisions of the bill to which I have invited attention.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it is proper here, Mr. President, that the Senate should know what the Secretary of Commerce and Labor thinks about this matter. That there is a duplication of work there is no question. I will say that the committee, through the chairman, did inform the Secretary, as is shown in the testimony, that it was desired that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor should get together, if they did not like our plan, and suggest some plan by which we could stop this duplication of work. It seems they could not get together, and that ended it. I now read from page 195 of the hearings:

Mr. NAGEL. As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, the House has provided in its bill for the consolidation of the activities of a number of bureaus, chiefly in my department and perhaps one in another department; and it appears to me that this part of the legislation presents a question that perhaps ought to be well considered. When the bill first came out of the committee in the House, it provided for a transfer of the Bureau of Manufactures to the State Department, and for a transfer of the Bureau of Statistics to the Census. I regarded both measures as unfortunate, and did what I could to state my position. The Bureau of Statistics is, as I take it, on the firing line of commercial information, and should not be sent to any other bureau which has more to do with the past. The Bureau of Manufactures is, in my judgment, the foundation of the whole Department of Commerce and Labor, if there ever is to be such a department, and I think, so far, we have only a suggestion of one. During the three years that I have been here I have done everything that I can to build up that bureau. I have endeavored to bring it in touch with the commercial and industrial forces of the country, and have directed to it nearly all of my attention in public speaking, and really hoped to develop something worth while.

Senator OVERMAN. Was not that really the idea of the establishment of that bureau?

Mr. NAGEL. That was my conception of it. Frankly, it has never seemed to me that the State Department should be charged with the immediate development of commercial interests.

Senator WETMORE. Those commercial interests that you have in mind are both domestic and foreign?

Mr. NAGEL. Yes. Of course, I think there ought to be a complete cooperation between the two departments.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you discussed with the State Department these changes as proposed in the House bill? If so, what is their attitude in the matter?

Mr. NAGEL. I will speak of that at once. It has been the subject of discussion from time to time, more especially as between myself and Mr. Wilson. Mr. Wilson and I do not agree, but I prefer to have him speak for himself upon that matter.

Senator OVERMAN. That is in no sense a commercial department of the Government.

Mr. NAGEL. His impression is, as I understand him, that the Bureau of Manufactures properly belongs to that department, and my impression is that inasmuch as it is to represent a commercial department proper, that bureau ought to be in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Senator WETMORE. You do not think they might be properly kept as they are, foreign relations and trade relations, or perhaps foreign trade relations, if that is the term, in the State Department, and the other part, as I take it, now in your department?

Senator OVERMAN. I do not suppose it is necessary to say so, but it looks to me like a duplication of work. I had something to do with the appropriations for this Bureau of Manufactures and commercial agents. There was great complaint at that time by all the manufacturers of this country that they could not get proper information. These consular officers sent abroad did not look after the interests of the manufacturers of this country, and the consequence was that an appropriation was made for that purpose.

* * * * * * *

Mr. NAGEL. Answering that one question, my understanding of the law is that the consular agents make their reports to my department through the State Department, and under the present practice the State Department first passes upon those reports and then transmits them to us. We then examine them and determine what part is to be made public.

* * * * * * *

Senator OVERMAN. Excuse me for the interruption, but I wanted to get that point clear right there, because we might not come back to that.

* * * * * * *

Mr. NAGEL. As to the Bureau of Trade Relations, I have been careful not to express any opinions, because it involves another department. I know the attitude of Secretary Wilson upon the question and he knows mine. I had assumed that perhaps we would continue just about as we have been doing, but Mr. Wilson is undoubtedly of the opinion that if there is to be a consolidation our bureau ought to go to him, while I am of the opinion that in such an event his ought to come to us. I have just stated the grounds for my contention upon that subject. But be that as it may, as I read the bill, as it comes from the House, the changes in the State Department, if they are to stand at all, are more radical than they should be. It does look to me as though the State Department had been deprived of a number of positions which it should have under all the circumstances, even if the Bureau of Trade Relations, in so far as it has to do with commerce, is transferred or modified. In other words, I think the change is more radical in the State Department than it should be under any view of the case. That involves details as to which I shall be glad to speak with Secretary Knox and endeavor to present the matter to the committee in some well-considered manner. I think that is the way in which we ought to present the matter. In fact, I should be glad to speak with the President about it, and get his direction as to the policy the departments ought to pursue with respect to this proposed change.

In accordance with that request we asked the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to confer with the Secretary of State, and in the hearings you will see what the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, says about it. It seems that the economy board was about to make a report, as Mr. Nagel understands, recommending these very changes; but the report has been withheld for some reason and has not come to us. Nobody, as I understand, is advocating this trade-relation matter except the Secretary of State himself. Now, to be perfectly fair and just, I want to read what Mr. Knox said about this question:

WORK OF BUREAU OF TRADE RELATIONS.

Recently, for instance, the South has been suffering with an arbitrary tare on cotton, which amounts to about twenty millions of dollars a year. The Bureau of Trade Relations took up that question and examined into the conditions in every cotton market in the world. It got photographs of bales that were shipped from the United States as compared with bales of cotton coming from other parts of the world, and showed the southern planters how they could save that money by a different method of baling. That matter was brought to the attention of the legislatures of the various States, and we never had a more grateful expression than we had from the governors of the States. Nobody hears about these things. They are not sensational. Nobody knows anything about them except the people directly concerned.

DUPLICATION OF WORK.

Senator OVERMAN. Right there, carrying out my idea with reference to that matter of baling cotton, I want to say that I know about that, and I know what has been done.

The people are very grateful; but the fact is that this other bureau has done the very same thing, and has sent its agents down to make speeches. They have made speeches in different parts of the South instructing the people along that very line. There is where the duplication that I am talking about comes in.

Secretary KNOX. But, you see, we have the service to call on for this information. We have an organized service as old as the Government itself, consisting of several hundred members, namely, the Consular Service. We have a consular office in every commercial center of the world.

Senator OVERMAN. That is not the question. It may be that you should do it all.

Secretary KNOX. But I am telling you why we are able to do it at such comparatively small expense. I am not saying a word against the efficiency——

Senator OVERMAN. And I do not want you to.

Secretary KNOX (continuing). Or the necessity of the Bureau of Manufactures in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Senator OVERMAN. But the question in my mind is, Can this duplication be stopped and money be saved? That is the point.

Secretary KNOX. If there is a duplication at all, it comes in as a minor part of the expenditure of the $29,000 in our Bureau of Trade Relations. Our Bureau of Trade Relations does a great deal that the Department of Commerce and Labor does not do at all, and the total cost of our bureau is $29,000 a year.

That is about what occurred in the committee, without reading it all.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I would like to hear some reason for the provision in regard to the officer of whom I am about to speak; the Secretary of State did not give any, and I have heard no reason given why we should provide for the officer who is called the "resident diplomatic officer." He has nothing to do with trade relations, and why should we establish such an office? The amount proposed to be appropriated for his salary was originally $7,500, but, I believe, on motion of the Senator from New Hampshire in the committee, it was reduced to $6,500. I do not see why we should have such an officer as a "resident diplomatic officer" at $6,500. There is an officer, created by the State Department originally, although it is true he has been carried in different appropriation bills, known as the "counselor for the Department of State," to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I agreed to the provision for that officer, because the former Secretary of State, the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], gave it as his opinion that that officer ought to be continued; but when we have the Secretary of State, the First Assistant Secretary of State at $5,000, the Second Assistant at $4,500, and the Third Assistant at $4,500, why we should have a resident diplomatic officer at a higher salary than the Assistant Secretaries I can not see. When it is in order to do so I want to move to strike out the provision for that officer, so as to perfect the amendment. I think that will be in order. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it in order to move to strike out certain lines in order to perfect this amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it in order to move an amendment to the amendment in order to perfect it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To the pending amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Most certainly it is.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, Mr. President, I move to strike out——

The VICE PRESIDENT. But there is one pending amendment which should be first disposed of.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think I offered that amendment, and, if so, I withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands an amendment to the amendment was offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], although the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time it was offered.

Mr. WARREN. The Chair is properly advised.

Mr. CUMMINS. My amendment is now pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not know he had offered his amendment. I agree with the Senator from Iowa, and if he will take this testimony and read it he will see what has been done in the Department of State. I think the amendment ought to be amended.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, so far as the chairman of the committee is concerned, I am willing to accept, and have accepted, the first amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and am perfectly willing now to accept the second.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment, as it has not yet been stated, as the Chair is advised.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, lines 22 and 23, it is proposed to strike out the words "and to be employed upon tariff, treaty, and trade relations and negotiations."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. That is the whole of that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the whole of the amendment to the amendment. Now the Senator from Iowa offers another amendment, as the Chair understands. Is the Chair right?

Mr. CUMMINS. I offered a second amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 7, after the word "with," it is proposed to insert "work of the department" and strike out the remainder of the amendment down to and including the words "and nine," in line 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the last amendment? I did not catch it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to have read the amendment of the committee as it will appear if amended as proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. OVERMAN. Beginning on page 34, line 22, after the words "Secretary of State," where, as I understand, the first amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Any one of whom may be employed as chief of division of far eastern, Latin American, near eastern, or European affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations; assistant solicitor, $3,000; law clerk, $2,500; clerks—one of class 4, three of class 3, two of class 1, three at $1,000 each; three assistant messengers; for meeting occasional and unforeseen expenses arising in connection with work of the department, $25,340.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Did the Senator arise to address himself to this particular amendment?

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming what explanation he has, if any, of the suggestion of Secretary Knox to the subcommittee as to the duplication of this work by the Department of State and the Department of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. WARREN. I will be very glad to reply to that suggestion. The subcommittee at first felt a good deal of uncertainty in regard to the matter, and were very careful to examine the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor and learn his views as to the proposed consolidation, and to learn from him, if they could, how much, if any, it would infringe upon the State Department and where the dividing line could be safely drawn between the two departments. My colleague on the committee across the aisle, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], has read a portion of the statement of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. We gave him exactly what he said was proper and right in the consolidation of the Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics, and, excepting certain higher salaries and certain extra employees, we were able to arrive at a conclusion which seemed to be satisfactory to him. Without settling the matter, however, we asked the Secretary of State and his assistants to appear before our subcommittee in order to learn from them their side of the case, giving them to understand that we were in favor of putting so much of the business affecting trade relations and commerce as was practicable under the Department of Commerce and Labor. The Secretary of State stated that the very utmost that was even liable to the suspicion of being a duplication of the duties and work of the two departments would only amount to not exceeding twenty-nine thousand two hundred and some dollars; and on inquiry he responded emphatically that it would not in reality amount to that sum of money, but that that was the utmost figure that could possibly be reached. We did ask the Secretary of State to compose the differences, if there were any, with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and, if possible, to secure the approval of the President, and he replied in the language the Senator has read from the hearings.

Since that time, I may say that I have been in conversation with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who takes no exception to the manner in which the committee has adjusted the matter.

Perhaps Senators have noticed that toward the end of the matter read by the Senator from North Carolina, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor said to us that he considered the cut made by the House affecting the State Department much too large; that they needed the men they had, and so forth. The subcommittee took the ground—and I take it for granted that the whole committee concurred—that twenty-nine thousand two hundred and some dollars is too small an amount to quibble over when it affects the entire foreign trade and commerce of the Nation. The United States to-day, as Senators know, is exporting a large volume of merchandise. Never before, perhaps, have the exports been larger, nor in fact so large; and it seems to me that in so important a work twenty-nine thousand two hundred and some dollars, even if a duplication were involved, would not break the Nation. On the other hand, it is perfectly evident to me, as I think it ought to be to everyone, that our consuls and diplomatic officers in various parts of the world must of necessity have information concerning trade conditions, and if they have the encouragement growing out of the knowledge that their efforts are appreciated by the State Department, if the small incidental expenses incurred in the seeking of trade and looking up trade statistics are covered, if they all have an ambition to extend the trade of the United States, why cut them off? They will not be in correspondence with the Department of Commerce and Labor. The State Department, the oldest department we have, have their agents, ambassadors, ministers, consuls general, consuls, and consular agents at various places throughout the world. They are there for diplomatic and other duties, and they are so situated that they are bound to be of value to the United States as to its commerce and trade, and there is no necessity of there being any undue infringement upon one department by the other or any considerable duplication of work. Why take away from the diplomatic and consular officers the incentive to report to the State Department their ideas as to how the trade of this country could be advanced along particular lines?

When the report goes to the State Department and is entered there the diplomatic part is taken out and the other part goes to the Department of Commerce and Labor. The Department of Commerce and Labor then follows it up.

For instance, we have been appropriating $60,000 a year for commercial agents. Suppose information comes through some consul or some minister to the State Department, and from there to the Department of Commerce and Labor, that a particular line of manufacture could be pushed in a certain large way in a certain country, or that there is certain information there that could be obtained, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has the funds and he has the authority to send a special agent there who can give his entire time to the work, and he can be properly introduced through our diplomatic corps.

I have thought, and the more I think of it the more strongly I am inclined to the opinion that the committee was right in taking the chances of a possible duplication of some small part of this twenty-nine thousand two hundred and odd dollars. The State Department officials abroad are our outside advance pickets. They are our scouts to investigate and report preliminaries, how, when, and where to take up and improve fields for advancement of our foreign trade, and the regular Commerce and Labor forces follow.

Mr. ROOT, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield, and to whom?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not think there is much, if any, avoidable duplication. There are two entirely distinct kinds of work to be done. The Department of Commerce and Labor is in communication with the producers and commercial interests of the United States. It is in touch with them. It is finding out their capacity for production, finding out what they need, and discussing trade conditions with them and informing them of opportunities to spread their trade. In the nature of things, the performance of that duty gives rise to many occasions for securing information from abroad and for getting things done abroad.

The securing of that information, in the ordinary course, can be best accomplished through the regular force of diplomatic officers and consuls who are under the direction of the State Department. The getting done of the things which the Department of Commerce and Labor thinks ought to be done, upon consultation with our producers, can be best secured through the State Department giving directions to the consuls and diplomatic agents who report to it.

The carrying on of those two ends of the same general business—one the domestic affairs and the other the foreign affairs—necessarily involves these two departments just as much as when the collection of duties, which ordinarily is under the charge of the Treasury Department, has for certain purposes to be put into the hands of the Department of Justice. In such cases there will be some little duplication of work. It is inevitable, but it is a necessary duplication of work.

The Bureau of Manufactures in the Department of Commerce and Labor belongs there. It ought not to be placed under the State Department. Its business is with our producers and our merchants; but, on the other hand, the little Bureau of Trade Relations in the State Department is a necessary agency to enable the Secretary of State to do what the Department of Commerce and Labor calls upon him to do. He can not write the letters himself; somebody has to do it for him. He can not carry on the communications that are necessary to give effect to the wishes of the Department of Commerce and Labor and the commercial interests of the country. And the agency through which this is done is called the Bureau of Trade Relations.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I called attention a moment ago to a provision on page 136 of this bill. Now, with the permission of the Senator from New York, I call attention to what appears as an amendment to the bill by the Senate committee on page 137, showing the still further duplication of this work:

For payment of the services of experts, and for other necessary expenditures connected with the collection of facts relative to the internal and foreign commerce of the United States, $4,000.

To further promote and develop the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, $60,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that is not an amendment on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. It appears to be.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is only transferred.

Mr. WARREN. It is put in a different place.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is in italics.

Mr. WARREN. That is because it had to be transferred to a different place.

Mr. CULBERSON. At all events, it provides for an expenditure of $60,000, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to develop not only domestic but foreign commerce.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. That same provision has been current for several years, and I may say, if I am any judge of the returns, that it has been one of the best paying investments we have made.

Mr. ROOT. I think that is a very wise provision, Mr. President.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I have no objection to this provision, if the Senator from New York will permit me, but I do not want a duplication of the same work by two departments.

Mr. ROOT. Certain parts of it have to be done by one department and certain parts by the other.

So far as my observation goes, the money that is given to the Department of Commerce and Labor for the purpose of stimulating our commerce, both foreign and domestic, is money well spent. But they can not do the whole work without calling on the State Department. The Secretary of State must have the agencies to enable him to do what he is called upon to do, just as much as a lawyer who is called upon to try a case for a merchant must have the clerks and other agencies necessary to enable him to represent that merchant's interests.

A very good illustration of the way in which both departments have to act is furnished by the reports referred to by the Senator from Wyoming. Our consuls all over the world are sending in regular reports in which they give information about trade and trade opportunities. At the same time, in the same papers, they are reporting about protection afforded American citizens, and about a great variety of matters with which the Department of Commerce and Labor has nothing whatever to do. They sometimes express themselves freely, as they are encouraged to do. They express opinions and give information to the Secretary of State which ought not to be made public.

Those reports, when they come in, have to be examined and blue-penciled, and have to have stricken from them the things which ought not to be published. When that has been done, the reports go over to the Department of Commerce and Labor, and there the commercial portions are published in the Daily Consular Reports, which go to all our mercantile people, and are of very great value.

I have seen many a time in those reports observations by a consul which would make it impossible for him to remain longer in his position if they had been made public. Somebody has to look after those things. So, in that one transaction of the report of a consul the officers of the two departments are called into play, one after the other, and you can not get along without either.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will agree, so far as I am personally concerned, that this item of $29,000 for the Bureau of Trade Relations is a small one. But now the Senator is talking about the services of the consular agents. They are provided for in another bill. The appropriations have all been made for that purpose, I believe. The information they give is very important; and it is sent down to the Department of Commerce and Labor, where it will be of great value, and they can send out their special agents to various countries.

Mr. ROOT. That is very proper.

Mr. OVERMAN. But what I want to ask is, What has the Secretary of State to do with this? He has his agents to get this information. What does he need this $29,000 for? All the information is sent down to the Department of Commerce and Labor. He obtains the information from the consular officers, and the consular officers are provided for in another appropriation bill. What else is to be done by the Secretary?

Mr. ROOT. The first thing is to inspect the reports and to cut out what should not go to the Department of Commerce and Labor. The next thing is to carry on the enormous correspondence.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was done under the Senator when he was a great Secretary of State, and he had none of these officers. He did not have this fund.

Mr. ROOT. I thank the Senator for the kind way in which he refers to me; but there was then a Bureau of Trade Relations which was doing just this work and which has been doing it since before we were born.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was going to say that has been done and was done under the Senator; but here we propose to appropriate $90,000 more than was allowed in those days. Right at this point I desire to ask the Senator another question, because I want to satisfy myself about it. I do not want to cripple the Department of State. I should like to have some one explain, because so far I have heard no explanation, what is the use of this resident diplomatic officer—something new in the history of our country—at $6,500? What can he do, and what is the reason for having him?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will answer the two inquiries together.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wanted to put the question so that before the Senator sat down he would reply to it.

Mr. ROOT. First, with regard to the increase of the appropriation for doing this necessary work of the State Department: I am not a member of the committee, and I am not familiar with the testimony that was taken, or the specific information that was given; but I can well see that it is necessary that there should be a very considerable enlargement of the provision for the work the State Department has to do.

In the first place, the so-called maximum and minimum clause of the tariff act enlarges the points of contact between the United States and foreign countries, and our trade is increasing enormously. You can not do the work appropriate to fostering commercial relations and rendering the necessary services in connection with a foreign trade that involves over two thousand million dollars of exports in a single year for the same amount of money that was sufficient for the much smaller foreign trade we formerly had.

The trade of the United States is pushing out all over the world, into all kinds of places and all kinds of countries; and it certainly does involve a very great increase of the burden upon the State Department. So while I do not know in detail I know in general that it is a wise expenditure of money to enable the State Department to take care of its end of the business. The amount is so small in proportion to the results which are secured that I should not think we had better spend much time on it.

Now, about the resident diplomatic agents: I do not know just what the practice has come to be, but the original idea, I understand, was that it would be a very useful thing to bring here for limited periods successively men who are engaged in foreign posts, that they may become familiar with the administration of affairs, with the views of the responsible officers here, and then go back to their posts, having at the same time given by their presence here a fuller familiarity with the conditions as they exist abroad. So we would have an interchange of experience and of knowledge between the home officers and the foreign officers. They would come from one post here, and after a short time here they would be sent off to another post. I do not know whether that plan has been carried out. If it has been, I should think that probably it would be very useful.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I understand from the suggestion that is made by him his idea contemplates not the appointment of an officer to this division taken from private life but the recalling of some officer who is now in office at some foreign post and having him on duty here awhile and then returning him to his diplomatic studies abroad, and so forth. I want to ask the Senator, in the case of Mr. Dawson—I know he had previously been in the Diplomatic Service—was he in the Diplomatic Service at the time he was called to the post of resident diplomatic officer?

Mr. ROOT. I can not answer that question authoritatively. I suppose that he was.

Mr. BACON. I suppose so.

Mr. ROOT. I had known him for many years as being a very efficient and very capable officer.

Mr. BACON. I know he had been in the Diplomatic Service, and I suppose that is true.

Mr. ROOT. It may be that I am all wrong about this, and I am only stating what my understanding was at the time the position was created.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia was inquiring about Mr. Dawson?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. Dawson's permanent diplomatic position abroad was as minister to Panama. He was recalled from that position to become the resident diplomatic officer of the Department of State.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly my understanding of it, though I did not know the details.

But I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New York and that of the Senate to the fact that the provision in this bill is not in harmony with the suggestion made by him, or by the policy which would be contemplated by his suggestion. This gives to the Secretary of State, if I correctly interpret the language, the power to appoint anyone whom he sees fit to the position. It does not provide for the recalling of an officer from a diplomatic post and assigning him to this duty, keeping him in the service, with the power to again designate him to resume either the same post or some other post; but it gives to the Secretary of State the arbitrary power to appoint. It does not even require that he shall be appointed by the President of the United States, and confirmed by the Senate, as would be the case of a diplomatic officer already in service who should be recalled, as the Senator from New York suggests, and assigned to duty here.

I think the provision as it stands is extremely objectionable. If it is to be an office of the dignity and rank and importance suggested by the Senator from New York the language ought to be so changed as that the officer either shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and in that way incorporated in the Diplomatic Service with the right of being transferred or assigned to other duties, or there ought to be language here which would contemplate the recalling of an officer. That might be put within the power of the Secretary of State without any other authority. But to give him the power to originally appoint an officer of this rank and this salary is, to my mind, extremely objectionable.

I should like to hear from the Senator from New York as to whether the suggestion which I make does not show that the bill, at least as framed, whatever may have been the design, is not calculated to carry out the particular function which he so clearly stated in his explanation to the Senate.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not think the provision is quite adequate to express all that I suppose is intended by it; but it does relieve the Secretary of State from an incapacity which arises from the very specific provisions of our statutes in relation to the appointment and the action of diplomatic officers. Neither the Secretary of State nor the President could bring to this country a diplomatic officer from China, Turkey, or any other country, however much he might wish the advice or however much he might wish to have instructions from that officer to those in the State Department, without having his pay cut off within the statutory period.

Mr. BACON. That is true; and yet, if the Senator will pardon me, I suggest to him that that was exactly the contemplation of the function as expressed by him heretofore—that he should come here and become familiar with conditions in the home office, and that he should also bring to the home office information as to what he had learned in the foreign post.

Mr. ROOT. I suppose that the phrase used, "resident diplomatic officer," was understood to express the purpose of the provision. He is to be a diplomatic officer of the United States, brought into residence here by authority of law, and while here to be paid a specified salary.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not mean brought from a foreign post?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator has just stated that that could not be. If he had been confirmed as an ambassador to France, for instance, he could not be brought back and assigned to duty here in the State Department without having his pay cut off.

Mr. ROOT. He could not, except for this provision. As I understand it, under this provision that can be done.

Mr. BACON. This provision certainly does not provide for that. It may be so amended as to make it provide for it.

Mr. ROOT. The pay specified here would take the place of the pay which he would have been receiving if he had been at his post performing the duties of that post.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, I want to suggest to him that it would not be simply the difficulty as to pay, but when an officer has been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, as ambassador to France, unless there is specific authority which would give the power to recall that officer and assign him to duty in the State Department, he certainly could not be appointed to that position under such language.

Mr. ROOT. I think this language was understood to authorize, and was intended to authorize, that very thing. As I say, it is not very full but undoubtedly that is the purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me a minute, it might be made perfectly clear by making it read:

Resident diplomatic officer, to be appointed by the Secretary of State from those employed in the Diplomatic Service abroad.

Mr. BACON. It can be made plain, of course. It can be so amended as to embrace that. But, Mr. President, I doubt very much whether this should be done. In the first place, I do not exactly appreciate the force of the suggestion that the State Department is going to be very largely benefited by having a diplomatic officer recalled from a foreign post and assigned to duty in the State Department, because the State Department is officered by those who are presumed to be quite familiar with all those matters which relate to the duties of the State Department. If this officer is to be in the nature of a permanent officer in the State Department, if the purpose is not simply the interchange of duties from a foreign post to duty in the State Department, but he is to be in the nature of a permanent officer in the State Department, then I think he ought to be classified in a different way. If he is to be in the State Department he is really intended to be an Assistant Secretary of State. If there is needed an additional Assistant Secretary of State he ought to be so classified, and he ought to be put there in that position.

We all remember, of course, three years ago, just before the present administration began, and when our present Secretary of State, then a Member of this body, had been designated as the future Secretary of State and had announced his intention to accept the office, and so forth, and was recognized as the Secretary of State under Mr. Taft when he should succeed to the office of President, there was an effort made to create the office of under secretary of state. That was the express wish of then Senator Knox, now Secretary Knox. The title was objected to because it was taken from the British nomenclature, and it was not approved by the Senate.

Then an effort was made on the part of some who desired to harmonize the law with the wishes of the future Secretary of State to give him the officer under another title, thinking that that possibly was the only objection. But Congress did not approve of it, although that was a Congress in each branch that belonged to the political party to which the then Senator and future Secretary belonged. But still, I would not let that stand in the way. If the Department of State is becoming so enlarged in its functions and in its duties and responsibilities as to require another assistant, I am perfectly willing to give it, because I suppose that I, as much as any other Senator, realize the importance of that department, and am willing to accord to it everything which is necessary to make it most efficient. But if we are going to make a change we should make it in a proper way. I do not think we should give the Secretary of State the right, on his own motion and by his own selection, to bring into office one who is to occupy that important relationship to the Department of State that this officer is seemed designed to occupy. I do not think that power ought to be given. He becomes an officer of the United States, and he should be an officer of the United States. If he is an officer of the United States under the Constitution he does not belong to the class of inferior officers contemplated by the Constitution when it said that the Congress may delegate the appointment to the head of a department. He belongs to an altogether different class, with altogether different dignity and altogether different power. He is an important officer; he practically stands next to the Secretary; and I have no doubt that the function which he will perform will be that which the officer who was sought to be secured under the name of undersecretary of state would have performed if he had been authorized by Congress.

For that reason I very seriously object to this provision as it is found in the bill. I am not objecting to the officer or to the pay, if he is needed. I presume he is, or the department would not ask for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Right there, let me interrupt the Senator. I wish to call attention to the fact that this gentleman, Mr. Dawson, to whom reference has been made, was, I understand, a very efficient officer, but he was called back and made Chief of the Division of Latin-American Affairs. Now, we have in this bill four new offices created under the $100,000 lump-sum appropriation of three years ago. We have four of them at the head of these divisions at $4,500 and we have four at $3,000. The Secretary of State speaks of these divisions in his testimony before the subcommittee. Here is the Division of Far Eastern Affairs, the Division of Latin-American Affairs, and Near Eastern Affairs. It seems that Mr. Dawson was recalled and made chief of one of these divisions, as is shown in this testimony. They have, as I said, four at $4,500, and they can at any time take one of these agents abroad and bring him to Washington and make him the chief of one of these divisions at $3,000. Of these officers 10 of them were never employed until three years ago. They are new officers created for Latin-American Affairs, Far Eastern Affairs, Near Eastern Affairs, and so on, with the diplomatic agent at $6,500. We have a First Assistant Secretary of State, we have a Second Assistant Secretary of State, and we have a Third Assistant Secretary of State. This diplomatic agent is given more salary than the first assistant or the second assistant or the third assistant. I think it is all wrong that this man should be given that amount of money and given more salary than the Assistant Secretaries of State are getting. Everything that was done has been accomplished, as the Senator from New York has said, by calling them back here and making them chiefs of divisions, as was done in the case of Mr. Dawson.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, what is the particular amendment now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment of the committee. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, in the committee amendment, line 7, beginning with the word "foreign," strike out all down to and including the word "nine," in line 15.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was accepted and adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. It was accepted, so far as the manager of the bill is concerned, and I did not know that it was objected to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question was not put. If there be no objection to the amendment to the amendment it is agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BACON. Now, if I am in order——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is.

Mr. BACON. I wish to move an amendment in reference to the matter which I have just been discussing. I am not, from my personal knowledge, satisfied as to the necessity for this officer, and therefore, in the amendment which I am about to offer, I do not mean to be understood as consenting to the fact that he is needed. He may be needed; I do not know, but if he is——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand that as far as the salary is concerned it was cut down $1,000.

Mr. BACON. I understand.

Mr. WARREN. It was $7,500, and it now stands at $6,500.

Mr. BACON. I think $6,500 is sufficient in view of the salaries of the other officers in the department. For instance, the first assistant receives $5,000 and the second assistant $4,500, I think. So this officer is certainly well paid if he performs the same class of work and is given $6,500.

The only amendment which I propose to offer relates to another matter altogether. If this officer is to be had I wish that he shall be an officer of the United States appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Therefore, without committing myself to the question of salary at present, I move to strike out, in the 20th line, the words "Secretary of State" and insert in lieu thereof "President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, at page 34, line 20, strike out——

Mr. WARREN. I wish to suggest to the Senator that if he will go a couple of lines above and put that in the same clause with the consular agent he will accomplish his purpose without so much language.

Mr. BACON. I am perfectly willing for any direction to be given to it that will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment to the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 34 of the committee amendment, line 20, strike out the words "Secretary of State" and in lieu thereof insert "President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. I accept the amendment as it is. I was going to shorten it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that the committee added those words after the word "consular." He was to be appointed by the Secretary of State also.

In line 19, I move to strike out "$6,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000," so as to make it the same salary as the First Assistant Secretary of State receives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 34, line 19, strike out "$6,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I can not accept that. I hope it will be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move an amendment. I do not know that it is necessary to move to strike out, but I have not heard sufficient reason given for the creation of this resident diplomatic officer at a salary of $6,500. I suggest that that portion of the amendment be not adopted. I think a motion to strike out would not be in order, because the amendment itself has not been adopted.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is in order to strike that out.

Mr. CULBERSON. While adhering to my opinion that it is not necessary because the amendment has not been adopted, I move, accepting the suggestion of the Chair, to strike out, in lines 19 and 20, the words "resident diplomatic officer, $6,500, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, in the committee amendment, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "resident diplomatic officer, $6,500, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. WARREN. I hope that will not carry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the demand? [After a pause.] Seven Senators have seconded the demand; not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to strike out the word "eight," in line 20, and insert "five."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 34, line 20, before the word "officers," strike out "eight" and insert "five," so as to read:

Five officers to aid in important drafting work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Right in this connection, before any further amendments are offered, I want to call attention to what the Secretary of State says, which has not been referred to, and which I think will be of interest to all concerned on this question of duplication of affairs or in reference to modifying the amount by different amendments.

At the bottom of page 324, in reply to some question pertinent to the appropriation of $29,000, he said:

But only a small part of that $29,000 is expended for work which could in any sense be regarded as duplication of work of the Department of Commerce and Labor. That sum of $29,000 covers all of the work of the Bureau of Trade Relations; and where they do lap over, if at all, it is only on an insignificant part of the expenditure.

Now, this is the main point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Senate:

Secretary KNOX. I want to add one thing that I intended to say when you spoke, Senator. From the direct efforts of the Bureau of Trade Relations we have gotten over $200,000,000 worth of new business for the United States—as the result of its direct efforts, backed up by the diplomacy of the department—to say nothing of what we may have gotten indirectly, which we can keep no track of and about which we have no information. But the Government never made a better investment than it made when it strengthened the Bureau of Trade Relations at the time we reorganized the department.

Farther down on that same page, and in reply to a question from the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]—

Do you publish reports of what has been done?

Secretary Knox said:

We have literature showing what the department has done. I do not know whether these gentlemen have brought any of it here or not.

This is the point I want to make: I happen to be in a position to know that by the report of the Consular Service, under the efficient officer of that department, every department of trade, particularly in the South, has felt the benefit of this additional detailed work. I am not in a position to know whether the officer has been the correct one or not, but I do know that in the last couple of years we have had more direct and efficient knowledge with reference to our foreign trade relations, and there has been a greater impetus given it by virtue of the knowledge we have gained, which at the proper time, if necessary, I can specify.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina if he knows whether this trade increase, which he has referred to, came from the operation of the State Department or the Department of Commerce and Labor? Undoubtedly the work has been duplicated.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am taking the statement of the Secretary of State.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator concludes I will ask him to read what Mr. Nagel said.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have read what Mr. Nagel said about it. I am simply speaking of the diplomatic relations of this country and the trade with foreign countries. Those relations involve all the nice relations of trade. He must necessarily be the editor in chief of what passes between this country and foreign countries, and I claim that by virtue of that $200,000,000 has been added directly, of which he has specific knowledge; how much more he does not know. I presume the overflow is what he is giving Mr. Nagel's department credit for. He said a lot of these things he did not know about; and I presume that that is the part that did not come particularly or properly through the diplomatic relations, but after being edited went through Mr. Nagel's department.

Mr. OVERMAN. Since the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] there is no use of this appropriation of $25,340. That money was appropriated for this purpose, to be employed upon tariff work, treaty work, and trade relations and negotiations. All that is stricken out. The clause "for meeting occasional and unforeseen expenses" is left in. Then we have stricken out all that is to be done under tariff legislation and otherwise, and in the negotiation and preparation of treaties. I move to strike out $25,340 and make it $20,340, because I think, with the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, $20,340 is enough for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 15, of the committee amendment, strike out "$25,340" and insert "$20,340."

Mr. CUMMINS. I express no opinion upon the point raised by the Senator from North Carolina. The work of the State Department which it is now authorized to do may justly require the expenditure of the sum of money named here. I rise only to say that my objection was not to the amount appropriated, for I have no opinion upon that subject. I have left that to the committee and I accept the judgment of the committee with regard to it. My objection was that a portion of this money seemingly was appropriated for a purpose with which the Secretary of State had nothing whatever to do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator. We have examined into it, and I think the chairman probably agrees with me. It will not take all this money since that amendment has been adopted.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to accept the amendment to the amendment rather than waste so much time.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the item of appropriations for the maintenance of the Department of State, on page 36, line 7, after the words "in all," to strike out "$260,300" and insert "$353,800," so as to read:

Clerks—16 of class 4, 16 of class 3, 25 of class 2, 41 of class 1, 3 of whom shall be telegraph operators, 16 at $1,000 each, 19 at $900 each; chief messenger, $1,000; 5 messengers; 22 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $420; packer, $720; 4 laborers, at $600 each; telephone switchboard operator; assistant telephone switchboard operator; in all, $353,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 16, after the word "repairs," to strike out "$9,000" and insert "$11,000," so as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of State: For stationery, furniture, fixtures, typewriters, including exchange of the same, repairs, and material for repairs, $11,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 3, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$50" and insert "$100"; and in line 4, after the word "foregoing," to strike out "$6,500" and insert "$7,000," so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous expenses, including the purchase, care, and subsistence of horses, to be used only for official purposes, repair of vehicles and harness, telegraph and electrical apparatus and repairs to the same, street car tickets not exceeding $100, and other items not included in the foregoing, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 9, after the words "Department of State," to strike out "$9,220" and insert "$11,720," so as to make the clause read:

For rent of buildings in the District of Columbia for the use of the Department of State, $11,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 37, line 15, before the word "each," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000"; in line 19, before the word "three," to strike out "assistant chief messenger, $1,000" and insert "two assistant chief messengers, at $1,000 each"; in line 20, before the word "messengers," to strike out "four" and insert "three"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$60,510" and insert "$61,270," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of the Treasury, $12,000; three Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $5,000 each; clerk to the Secretary, $2,500; executive clerk, $2,400; stenographer, $1,800; three private secretaries, one to each Assistant Secretary, at $2,000 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $2,250; clerks—one of class 4, four of class 3, two of class 2; chief messenger, $1,100; two assistant chief messengers, at $1,000 each; three messengers, at $900 each; three messengers; in all, $61,270.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the chief clerk and superintendent of the Treasury Department, on page 38, line 13, before the word "firemen," to strike out "three" and insert "eight"; and in the same line, after the word "firemen," to strike out "five firemen," so as to read:

Eight elevator conductors, at $720 each, and the use of laborers as relief elevator conductors during rush hours is authorized; eight firemen; coal passer, $500.

Mr. REED. I do not want to cavil about the bill, but I notice as we run along there is a constant increase everywhere. I should like to know why it is that we increase the number of firemen?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will notice, we have not increased the firemen, but we have simply added the two. Where it says "three firemen" and "five firemen" we make it "eight firemen."

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for that explanation, but on the page we have just passed we were raising salaries right along.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that the Treasury Department?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say for the Treasury Department that is one department where I am inclined to give them what they ask, because they have decreased in their department thousands of dollars below the estimates. They have reorganized and saved I do not know how much. They seem to be determined to economize. That is one department I have investigated where I think we should give them what is proposed here.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 17, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in the same line, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "one" and insert "three"; in the same line, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "three" and insert "six"; in line 18, after the word "messenger," to insert "messenger boy, $360"; and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$46,060" and insert "$51,620," so as to make the clause read:

Division of Customs: Chief of division, $4,000; assistant chief of division, $3,000; law clerks—5 at $2,500 each, 2 at $2,000 each; clerks—3 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 6 of class 1, 5 at $1,000 each; messenger; assistant messenger; messenger boy, $360; in all, $51,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 10, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "three" and insert "four," and in line 17, after the words "in all," to strike out "$72,170" and insert "$73,770," so as to make the clause read:

Division of Loans and Currency: Chief of division, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,700; custodian of paper, $2,250; bond and interest clerk, $2,000 (in lieu of division chief at $2,000 transferred from register's office); clerks—5 of class 4 (1 transferred from register's office), 4 of class 3 (2 transferred from register's office), 5 of class 2 (3 transferred from register's office), 5 of class 1 (2 dropped and 4 transferred from register's office), 1 clerk, $1,000, 18 at $900 each; assorter of bonds, $800 (transferred from register's office); 12 expert money counters, at $720 each; messenger; 3 assistant messengers (1 transferred from register's office); 8 laborers; in all, $73,770.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 2, before the word "bookbinder," to strike out "one at $900" and insert "two at $900 each," and in line 3, after the words "in all," to strike out "$32,370" and insert "$33,270," so as to make the clause read:

Division of Printing and Stationery: Chief of division, $2,500; assistant chief of division, $2,000; clerks—4 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 3 of class 1, 1 at $1,000, 2 at $900 each; bookbinder, $1,250; 3 messengers; assistant messenger; 2 laborers; messenger boy, $360; in all, $33,270.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 12, before the word "chief," to insert "assistant chief of files and record division, $2,250"; in line 14, after the words "one at," to strike out "$2,200" and insert "$1,800"; and in line 25, after the words "in all," to strike out "$142,920" and insert "$144,770," so as to make the clause read:

For the following now authorized and payable from general appropriations, namely: For chief of technical division, $3,000; assistant constructor, $2,750; assistant chief of files and record division, $2,250; chief structural engineer, $2,750; assistant chief structural engineer, $2,400; inspectors of supplies—1 at $2,300, 1 at $1,800; inspectors—5 at $2,300 each, 3 at $2,000 each, 1 at $1,800; photographer, $2,000; 6 administrative clerks, at $2,000 each; clerks—1 of class 4, 4 at $1,700 each, 4 of class 3, 6 at $1,500 each, 8 of class 2, 8 at $1,300 each, 13 of class 1, 4 at $1,100 each, 6 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each, 2 at $840 each; duplicating paper chemist, $1,200; foreman vault, safe and lock shop, $1,100; assistant messenger; messenger boys—3 at $480 each, 2 at $360 each: skilled laborers—4 at $1,000 each, 7 at $960 each, 1 at $900, 1 at $840; laborer, $600; in all, $144,770, which shall be paid out of the appropriation made in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1913 for "General Expenses of Public Buildings."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, after line 20, to strike out:

Hereafter the administrative examination of all public accounts, preliminary to their audit by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be made, as contemplated by the so-called Dockery Act, approved July 31, 1894, and all vouchers and pay rolls shall be prepared and examined by and through the administrative heads of divisions and bureaus in the executive departments and not by the disbursing clerks of said departments except that the disbursing officers shall make only such examination of all vouchers as may be necessary to ascertain whether they represent legal claims against the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to have some explanation of that amendment from the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the auditing now as to preliminary work and the handling of funds is through bonded officers. The regular auditing officer after that, of course, does the auditing, and the account has to pass the Treasury Department. This would provide that the first audit must be where the matter now lands finally, which would lead to a great deal of delay. The committee thought it best to strike out the clause and to take the matter up with the House conferees, because it appeared to the committee as not only unnecessary under the present arrangement of business, but as expensive in its delay. If the conferees shall find to the contrary, of course the matter can be arranged in conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the language in the bill as it came from the other House which it is proposed to strike out is:

Hereafter the administrative examination of all public accounts, preliminary to their audit by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be made, as contemplated by the so-called Dockery Act, approved July 31, 1894, and all vouchers and pay rolls shall be prepared and examined by and through the administrative heads of divisions and bureaus in the executive departments and not by the disbursing clerks of said departments, except that the disbursing officers shall make only such examination of all vouchers as may be necessary to ascertain whether they represent legal claims against the United States.

It seems to me that the provision contemplated by the Dockery Act is a provision safeguarding public funds and calculated to prevent anything wrong in the departments. I do not feel like delaying the consideration of the bill, but I do wish to express the hope that the Senate conferees will not strike out what is substantially intended by the provision as it comes from the House, even though they may desire to some extent to amend or modify it.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether there are any changed conditions which make this modification desirable, or whether the law has been found to work inconveniently?

Mr. WARREN. The Dockery Act, so called, has not been in force exactly as here proposed, because the departments have, as the Senator knows, grown very rapidly, and they have a great deal in the way of mere small details of business to attend to. They have also much to do at a great distance in our possessions thousands of miles away; and to delay such transactions until they can come to a head of a department would be to duplicate the work, to greatly increase the expense, and to inconvenience the public.

Mr. BACON. It was with reference to that point that I made the inquiry whether the changed conditions have been brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Changed conditions have very largely influenced the matter. I do not think that the auditing and disbursing accounts of the Government have shown defalcations enough or shortages enough to make us suspicious of the present mode. If the system can be improved, all right; but those who have the matter in charge have explained the delay and duplication which must occur under the present system.

Mr. BACON. As I understand, the Senator does not propose to entirely abandon the system, but to simply modify it?

Mr. WARREN. We simply propose to handle it in a convenient way. The system of auditing and disbursing will be just as complete, but it will not be unnecessarily duplicated—in fact, continue to do as we are now doing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the present mode, or the lawful mode, at any rate, is the mode indicated here. If any of the departments have not been pursuing that course, they have been violating the law. It may be true, as regards some of the outlying possessions of the United States, that this is rather an inconvenient thing; and it may be true that it would be well to modify it as regards them; but to come in and strike down a course which has been required by law to be pursued, upon the ground that it has not been pursued; that is, upon the ground that public officials have neglected their duty, is not to give a good reason for the change.

Mr. WARREN. I have not put it upon that ground. I do not want the Senator to misstate me. I say that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator stated, as I understood, that the Dockery law had not been obeyed.

Mr. WARREN. Conditions have changed. Let me state to the Senator from Mississippi that, for instance, the Department of Agriculture, within his remembrance and mine, was headed by a commissioner and required an appropriation of but three or four hundred thousand dollars a year. At about the time the Dockery Act was passed all its business was transacted in a little building down here across the way; but at the present time the officials of that department are handling and paying out money nearly all over these United States and abroad as well. The Forestry Service, involving the payment of employees, the sale of timber, and all that, has to be dealt with, and they have their experiment stations everywhere. There has also been a great expansion in the other departments. The convenience of business as a matter of economy should be kept in view. If the Senator feels there is any lack of provision for proper auditing or proper disbursement, I should be glad to know it, for we ought to provide against anything of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The precise provision that is stricken out is a provision of the present law, is it not, I ask the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. If so, why did the House put it in?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the House put it in?

Mr. WARREN. The House put it in the bill and we struck it out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that; I thought that was the provision of the law now.

Mr. WARREN. It was not in the current law for this year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that; I thought it was in the law now.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that the Dockery Act had ever been repealed or had ever ceased to point the course required by law to be pursued.

Mr. WARREN. This came to us in this bill as new legislation. So far as its place in the bill is concerned, we took it up with the departments, found that it was going to be burdensome, and therefore we struck it out; but we are perfectly willing, if the House conferees can show any reason why it should be left in, to leave it in when the bill comes out of conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When was the so-called Dockery Act repealed?

Mr. WARREN. I am not a lawyer, and therefore I do not follow legal questions. I submit that matter to the Senator himself, who has been for many long years a Member of the other House and of this. I do think it has been repealed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it was ever repealed during my course of service in the House of Representatives—I was out of public life for two years, and I can not speak as to that time—I do not recall it. If it was done, it certainly was done, as the darkies say, "unbeknownst" to me, but I do not think it ever was repealed.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been repealed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought not. Then, if it has not been repealed, the House is merely by this provision requiring a law upon the statute book to be executed.

Mr. WARREN. If it has not been repealed, then why put it in the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is a declaration upon the part of the legislative body that a law which has been neglected must be obeyed; and it is admitted that it has been neglected and disobeyed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I inquire what was done with the amendment we were discussing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that, without objection, the amendment was agreed to, and the Chair heard no objection.

Mr. REED. I would not want to file a complaint, but the Chair did not give time to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question again. The Chair does not wish to foreclose any Senator.

Mr. REED. I thought that would be the attitude of the Chair. I desired to make an inquiry, and that is all. The committee strike out this provision for auditing. They have stated the reasons for their action, but there is no provision which I have seen in the bill that does take the place of the auditing provided for; and therefore would not the adoption of the amendment leave us without any provision in the bill for the proper auditing and examination of accounts?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. REED. Well, where is the provision?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the House provision is stricken out the preliminary auditing will not be done according to the Dockery Act, but will be done by the disbursing clerks. I think, however, it ought to be done——

Mr. WARREN. The auditing and disbursing is done by bonded officers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it ought to be done by the administrative heads of the divisions and bureaus.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if I remember correctly, this matter was brought to our attention by the Attorney General of the United States. He suggested that we strike out the words "shall be prepared," because he said many heads of departments could not possibly——

Mr. WARREN. That was in another place in the bill, not here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But undoubtedly, if the Senator will permit the interruption, if the words "shall be prepared" were stricken out that would obviate the difficulty to which the Senator from Wyoming is calling attention, to wit, the difficulty in auditing accounts in the Philippines and in our other outlying possessions.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is exactly why we cut out that provision, but we did so without prejudice. The House may have more information than we have about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not objected to that. I rose merely for the purpose of expressing the wish that the Senate would not strike down this provision, and that, upon the contrary, it would modify the existing Dockery Act only to the extent found absolutely necessary, to wit, as affecting our foreign possessions.

Mr. WARREN. The committee is in harmony with the Senator about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that will be the final report from the conference committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that was exactly our idea in striking out the words "shall be prepared," so that it should go into conference, and then the conferees could understand it, and make some arrangements for the auditing of these accounts.

Mr. REED. Then, it is the purpose of the committee, as I understand, before the bill is completed, to provide for a proper auditing of accounts?

Mr. WARREN. That is all provided for under the present law. We are leaving nothing open. This is new matter, put in the bill in accordance with statements made by the Attorney General and others as to the great inconvenience that would result from leaving in the provision inserted by the House. If we strike that out, as I have said, we want the benefit of all the information the House has about it; and if we leave in a part of their language and amend it only to a small degree, we will have no power to amend that which has passed both bodies.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if I am not mistaken, the provision as it comes from the House amounts to this: The present law, known as the Dockery law, prescribes the manner in which accounting officers shall audit accounts. This language provides for something which shall be done before they go to the accounting officer. That is all there is to it.

I should judge, from reading this provision, that heretofore the preliminary examinations have been made by disbursing clerks. This clause is to provide that hereafter these preliminary examinations, before the accounts go to the auditing officers, shall not be made by the disbursing officers, but shall be made by and through the administrative heads of divisions and bureaus. That is all there is to it.

Mr. WARREN. That means a delay of many, many months.

Mr. BACON. That is the change that is proposed. It is not proposed to change the manner of auditing.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; not in the end.

Mr. BACON. It is simply proposed to change what shall precede the auditing.

Mr. WARREN. The preliminary work.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be true, but that is not my understanding of it. My understanding is that the State Department especially, and the War Department to some extent, have felt forced by circumstances not to comply strictly with the existing law. Instead of modifying the existing law as regards our distant possessions—and all this has grown out of the situation in our distant possessions—the House has redeclared the law in its full completeness and strength; and the Senate, by striking it out, would do away with it everywhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 44, line 16, after the sum "$2,000," to insert "chief of division of accounts, $2,500"; in line 17, before the word "chiefs," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; in line 18, before the words "of class four," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-five"; in line 19, before the words "of class two," to strike out "sixty-two" and insert "sixty-one"; and in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$309,570" and insert "$310,470," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Auditor for War Department: Auditor, $4,000; chief clerk and chief of division, $2,250; law clerk, $2,000; chief of division of accounts, $2,500; 2 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; clerks—25 of class 4, 49 of class 3 (1 transferred to disbursing clerk), 61 of class 2, 50 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each, 5 at $900 each; skilled laborer, $900; messenger; 5 assistant messengers; 10 laborers; messenger boy, $480; in all, $310,470.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 10, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "twenty-three" and to insert "twenty-eight," so as to read:

Office of Auditor for Interior Department: Auditor, $4,000; chief clerk and chief of division, $2,250; law clerk, $2,000; 2 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; clerks—14 of class 4, 16 of class 3, 28 of class 2 (1 transferred to office of disbursing clerk), 28 of class 1 (1 transferred to office of disbursing clerk).

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I have one word of explanation there, please? That amendment and the one in the next line increase the number of clerks by 10, and increase the pay roll, I think, by approximately $11,000. Why is that?

Mr. WARREN. Because they have not help enough to do the work, according to the statement they make—and they made a very clear statement to us. The Interior Department, as the Senator knows, occupies a very broad field, and its transactions are constantly growing. Legislation adds to the work from time to time, and they were without the necessary help to do the work. The committee were satisfied that they needed that many more men.

Mr. REED. It is simply because of the increase of work, then?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause, in line 11, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "eight" and insert "thirteen," and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$143,250," and to insert "$154,000," so as to read:

Thirteen at $1,000 each, one at $900; two messengers; three assistant messengers; one laborer; in all, $154,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, down to line 11, on page 46.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask a question there. There are no figures put in after "charwomen."

Mr. WARREN. There is a regular, standard salary of $240.

Mr. BACON. Of course, I understand that the wages are fixed by law.

Mr. WARREN. Except where the amount is named, it would be $240 for each charwoman.

Mr. BACON. I am not objecting to the amount they are paid, but it occurred to me that it ought to be expressed.

Mr. WARREN. Wherever it is not expressed, it means $240 each.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 19, after the words "the compensation of," to strike out "employees engaged in tabulating" and insert "such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate," so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, during the fiscal year 1913, in his discretion, diminish the number of positions of the several grades below the grade of clerk at $1,000 per annum in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department and use the unexpended balances of the appropriations for the positions so diminished as a fund to pay, on a piece-rate basis, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the compensation of such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate, by the use of mechanical devices, the accounts and vouchers of the postal service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the Office of the Treasurer of the United States, on page 48, line 16, before the words "silver piler," to strike out "pressmen, $1,400" and insert "compositor and pressman, $1,500," and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "three hundred and forty-five thousand three hundred and ninety dollars" and insert "three hundred and forty-five thousand four hundred and ninety dollars," so as to read:

Compositor and pressman, $1,600; compositor and pressman, $1,500; silver piler, $1,000; in all, $345,490.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 12, before the words "expert counters," to strike out "seven" and insert "twelve"; in line 14, before the words "in all," to insert "two charwomen"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$38,780" and insert "$43,460," so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of the national currency (to be reimbursed by the national banks), namely: Superintendent, $2,500; teller, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 4 at $1,000 each, 5 at $900 each; engineer, $1,000; 12 expert counters, at $840 each; 3 counters, at $700 each; assistant messenger; fireman; messenger boy, $360; 2 charwomen; in all, $43,460.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 3, after the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 4, before the words "of class four," to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "twenty-nine"; in line 5, before the words "of class three," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-five"; and in line 8, after the words "in all," to strike out "$332,700" and insert "$338,100," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Commissioner of Internal Revenue, $6,000; deputy commissioner, $4,000; deputy commissioner, $3,600; chemist, $2,500; first assistant chemist, $1,800; second assistant chemist, $1,600; third assistant chemist, $1,400; 3 heads of divisions, at $2,500 each; 6 heads of divisions, at $2,250 each; superintendent of stamp vault, $2,000; private secretary, $1,800; clerks—3 at $2,000 each; 29 of class 4, 25 of class 3, 37 of class 2, 37 of class 1; 32, at $1,000 each; 42, at $900 each; 3 messengers; 21 assistant messengers; and 16 laborers; in all, $338,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued down to line 24 on page 52.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it is now 6 o'clock, and I understand an executive session is desired. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he will not suspend the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. WARREN. I wanted to get over to another page, but it does not matter. I wish to give notice that I shall endeavor to continue consideration of the bill early to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that motion long enough to allow me to introduce a motion, I should like, out of order, to ask unanimous consent to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. CULLOM. I do, if there will be no debate about it.

THE COMMERCE COURT.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I give notice that I shall move that the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 3297) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a Commerce Court, etc.," approved June 18, 1910, and that the bill be placed on the calendar, under Rule VIII, for consideration by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice of the Senator from Washington will lie over and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 8, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 7, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who hast ever been our refuge and our strength, without whom we are nothing, continue Thy blessings that these Thy servants may be guided in their deliberations by Thy counsels, that the interests which they represent may be subserved in accordance with the eternal fitness of things. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IMPEACHMENT OF CORNELIUS H. HANFORD.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege and also of the greatest importance. By virtue of my office as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Cornelius H. Hanford, judge of the western district of the State of Washington, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with having annulled, on May 13, 1912, in violation of the Constitution and on a frivolous charge, the naturalization papers of Leonard Oleson.

I charge him with having been guilty of a long series of unlawful and corrupt decisions.

I charge him with having issued in the collusive suit of Augustus Peabody v. The Seattle, Renton & Southern Railway, in August, 1911, an injunction in the interests of the company and against the interests of the citizens of Seattle, flagrantly in violation of justice and law.

I charge him with being an habitual drunkard.

I charge him with being morally and temperamentally unfit to hold a judicial position.

In accordance with former proceedings before the House of Representatives in like cases, I submit the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 576.

Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the official misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford; whether he has been in a drunken condition while presiding in court; whether he has been guilty of corrupt conduct in office; whether his administration has resulted in injury and wrong to litigants of his court and to others affected by his decisions; and whether he has been guilty of any misbehavior for which he should be impeached.

That this committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ, if necessary, an additional clerk and stenographer, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee.

That the subcommittee shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to the said Committee on Judiciary.

That the expenses incurred in this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I correctly got the reading of the resolution, but as I heard it it declared that the judge was guilty of misconduct. I think the word "alleged" should be inserted before the word "misconduct."

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understood, that was a preliminary statement by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that this is a resolution to have the conduct of Judge Hanford inquired into.

The SPEAKER. That is it.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the first part of the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will again report the resolution.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the official misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford——

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, that is the portion of the resolution to which I referred—"concerning the official misconduct" of this man. I would suggest that it would be in keeping with the rest of the resolution to have the word "alleged" inserted before the word "misconduct."

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to accept that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the matter is not open for amendment, as I understand. The gentleman from Wisconsin merely asks to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BERGER. That is right, and that committee can amend it if it sees fit.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to change his resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I think it is unnecessary to amend it. The statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] before he introduced the resolution is in accordance with the practice which has obtained in like cases heretofore, and the resolution follows, as near as may be, resolutions in like cases heretofore referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary will not take the gentleman's statement on the floor, nor the resolution itself, in any broader sense than as an allegation, and will treat it as such. Such resolutions and such statements have always been treated as allegations or charges only; not as proof. Therefore, it seems to me, while there could be no objection to putting in the word "alleged," as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it is unnecessary so to do; but if the gentleman from Massachusetts insists upon it, let the gentleman from Wisconsin ask for unanimous consent to insert that word.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert the word "alleged" before the word "misconduct."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to insert the word "alleged" in the resolution at the place suggested. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest a pro forma amendment to the resolution. The resolution as read refers to "the Committee on Judiciary." The word "the" is omitted before the word "Judiciary," as I heard the resolution read. That committee is ordinarily and correctly designated as "the Committee on the Judiciary."

Mr. BERGER. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert the word "the" prior to the word "Judiciary." Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. OLMSTED. I merely wish to suggest that the resolution calls for an investigation and ascertainment of whether or not this judge has been drunk upon the bench. I do not understand any allegation has been made that he is or ever was drunk upon the bench.

The SPEAKER. Why, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] in his preliminary remarks alleged that he was drunk most of the time.

Mr. BERGER. Habitually drunk. I do not know he is drunk all the time. He is charged with being an habitual drunkard.

Mr. OLMSTED. He might have sober intervals. Does the gentleman charge him with being drunk upon the bench?

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 18712, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Pensions from the further consideration of the bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18712) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how many of such bills does the gentleman desire to offer?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have in my hand four, and we can get rid of them quickly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will there be any controversy?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 20628, with Senate amendments, and ask to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 22194, with Senate amendments, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Pensions from the further consideration of the bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 22194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 23765, with Senate amendments, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Pensions from the further consideration of the bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 23765) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair announces the following conferees on all these bills: Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey.

REGULATION OF RADIO COMMUNICATION.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 3815, and ask that the House insist on the House amendments and agree to the conference asked.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a Senate bill with House amendments, and the gentleman from Missouri asks that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3815. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman if this bill goes to conference whether it is the intention to enlarge the scope of this bill or merely to arrange the differences between the two Houses?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no advice as to the intention of the Senate conferees, but there is no intention on our part to enlarge the scope at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. HARDY, and Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington.

COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented the views of the minority on the bill H. R. 25034, to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, for printing under the rule.

[House Report 829, part 2, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

REDUCTION OF THE DUTIES ON COTTON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following as the views of the minority, to accompany H. R. 25034:

This bill in so far as it relates to duties on manufactures of cotton is identical with the bill which was vetoed by the President a little less than a year ago. A brief reference to its history compels the belief that it is now reported by the majority without any expectation or desire that it shall be enacted into law.

In the Sixty-first Congress the Democratic membership of the Ways and Means Committee unanimously joined with the Republican members of that committee in reporting a bill to create a tariff board, whose duty it should be to make a thorough investigation and furnish the necessary information on which to base an orderly and scientific revision of tariff schedules. This bill was passed by the House by a large majority and concurred in by the Senate with an immaterial amendment. In the closing hours of the session it was defeated by a filibuster led by a Democratic Member. By a provision in the sundry civil appropriation bill, however, a tariff board was created and proceeded to the performance of its duties.

Notwithstanding this fact, at the extra session of this Congress the majority, without waiting for any report from the Tariff Board, proceeded to prepare and pass through the House a bill identical in terms with that now reported. That bill was made without any information additional to that which the committee had when the present tariff law was framed and enacted. No hearing was accorded to any parties whose interests were involved. The bill was rushed through the House pursuant to the dictate of a Democratic caucus without deliberation or opportunity for amendment. When it reached the Senate the Democrats of that body were not slow in finding out that its passage would result in the crippling of a southern industry. It was loaded down with amendments. One amendment tacked onto it was a revision of the metal schedule. Another amendment tacked onto it was a revision of the chemical schedule. This latter may not be inaptly termed as grotesque. It was not the result of any committee examination or report. It was offered from the floor of the Senate, and, as was subsequently discovered, represented the guesswork of a Treasury employee who had been instructed to turn specific duties into ad valorem, and then, regardless of the effect, to reduce these ad valorem duties uniformly all along the line. One effect of this amendment was to abolish the customs duties on alcohol imposed to compensate for the high internal-revenue tax and thus deprive the Government of a very large revenue. This, however, did not result in killing the bill. On its return to the House the Democratic majority proceeded to concur in the amendments en bloc without question or deliberation, and so the bill went to the President. He had no alternative but to veto it. This he did, both because of the Senate amendments and because of the crude and haphazard character of the bill as it affected the cotton industry. The bill had not had the informing report of the Tariff Board, although that report was in process of preparation and promised within a short time thereafter. In his veto message the President said, inter alia:

"My objection to the cotton schedule is that it was adopted without any investigation or information of a satisfactory character as to the effect which it will have upon an industry of this country in which the capital invested amounted in 1909 to $821,000,000, the value of the product to $629,000,000, the number of wage earners to 379,000, making, with dependents, a total of at least 1,200,000 persons affected, and the wages paid annually amounted to $146,000,000. The bill would not go into effect by its terms until January 1 next, and before that time a full report to be submitted to Congress by the Tariff Board, based upon the most thorough investigation, will show the comparative cost of all the elements of production in the manufacture of cotton in this and other countries. The investigation by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House did not cover the facts showing this comparative cost, for the reason that the committee was preparing a bill on a tariff-for-revenue basis and their view of a proper tariff was avowedly at variance with the theory of protection. Pledged to support a policy of moderate protection, I can not approve a measure which violates its principle."

The protests that came up from the South, and had their influence on the Senate, showed conclusively the unwillingness of that section to have any tariff tinkering that would affect its industries. It was then publicly announced that revision of the cotton schedule had been laid aside.

On the 22d day of March, 1912, the Tariff Board made its report on the cotton schedule. Like its previous report on the wool schedule, the report was thorough and comprehensive, and furnished the necessary data on which to base an orderly and scientific revision of the duties relating to the manufactures of cotton. This report makes clear the crude, careless, and haphazard character of the bill which the President had vetoed and which is now again reported by the committee, without modification or change, except in the abandonment of the Senate amendments. The committee has paid no attention to the report of the Tariff Board, except to find fault with it because of the condemnation to be found in it of their bill.

The original discredited bill is now again reported, while there is pending in the Senate and not yet acted upon a bill relating to the tariff on wool, a bill relating to the sugar tariff, and while a bill relating to the metal schedule also remains undisposed of. It is hardly necessary to say that the profession by the party in power of a desire to revise the tariff and its actions are not consistent with each other.

Having these facts in mind, and the further fact that no reason can be assigned to justify the President in approving the same bill which he has heretofore disapproved, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the report of this bill at this late day of the session is to serve some other purpose than its enactment into law.

If the majority are willing to enter upon a genuine revision of the cotton schedule, availing themselves of the information furnished by the report of the Tariff Board, the minority will cheerfully cooperate with them in such revision.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and I would like to have the Clerk read the statement I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the present chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture of this House promised, in April, 1911, that there would be a rigid investigation of the Weather Bureau "at an early date," which promise has not been kept——

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up very many minutes of the time of the House, but as this statement is a false one, I would like to present the facts to the House as briefly as I may. This resolution (H. Res. 570) was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN]. I do not know what information he had. I do know that the gentleman has never had any communication with me, directly or indirectly, orally or written, concerning the subject matter of the resolution. He has never been in the committee room, and if he has any information regarding any irregularities in the Weather Bureau he has never brought it to my attention, or, so far as I know, to any member of the committee.

I was a member of this committee during the Sixty-first Congress under the chairmanship of Mr. Graham of Pennsylvania, during which time the chief of the bureau came before the committee and made a full statement of the operations of his department; and so far as I know there were no charges of any kind preferred against his management. Later on, noticing a statement in the press over the signature of a Mr. Berry of this city, that there were certain irregularities that ought to be called to the attention of Congress, I made a clipping and laid it away; and after the committee had been organized—in the present Congress—I wrote Mr. Berry that the committee would be glad to have him bring before the committee any information he had regarding the Weather Bureau which ought to be investigated. The committee then organized, and decided to work under subcommittees and the chairman was authorized to appoint a subcommittee to take up the question of the particular charges, referred to by Mr. Berry; and on April 22, 1911, I wrote the following letter to Mr. Berry:

APRIL 22, 1911.

Mr. JAMES BERRY,
1½ Third Street SE., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Again referring to your favor of March 31 concerning the administration of affairs in the Weather Bureau, I beg to inform you that I have named Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, who is a member of this committee, to confer with you and to go over the evidence you wish to present to the full committee.

You will kindly arrange with Mr. DOUGHTON, whom you will find at room 447, House Office Building, as to the time which will be most convenient to you both.

Very truly, yours, RALPH W. MOSS, Chairman.

Finding that Mr. DOUGHTON was out of the city at that time, I wrote him on May 11, 1911:

MAY 11, 1911.

Mr. JAMES BERRY,
14 Third Street SE., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to my letter of recent date, in which I requested you to call upon Mr. DOUGHTON, I beg to advise you that he has now returned to the city, and will be pleased to see you at his office at any time.

Very truly, yours,

RALPH W. MOSS,
Member of Congress.

Mr. Berry called upon Mr. DOUGHTON and took up the question with him, and Mr. DOUGHTON came back to me and said that it was a matter that he did not care to settle himself and he preferred that I take the question up as chairman of the committee, and accordingly, on May 31, I wrote Mr. Berry the following letter:

MAY 31, 1911.

Mr. JAMES BERRY,
14 Third Street SE., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I would request that you call at the committee room of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture at 10 a. m. to-morrow, June 1, as I desire to talk with you in regard to the charges you have made against the Weather Bureau.

Very truly, yours,

RALPH W. MOSS, Chairman of Committee.

Mr. Berry came in response to this, and I requested him to submit in writing whatever charges he had to submit against Prof. Moore and the operation of the Weather Bureau. He submitted in writing what charges he had to prefer against the bureau at that time, together with whatever oral explanation he had to make of the evidence he had behind the charges, and thereupon I called an informal conference of the Democratic members of the committee, which was attended by every one of the majority members—Mr. FLOYD, Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. MAYS, and myself. I submitted to these members the written charges that Mr. Berry had made, and it was the opinion of the members that, in the main, the charges as made were not worthy of calling a congressional investigation for the special purpose of examining them. There were, however, some particular specifications referring to Mount Weather and one or two other matters that I took up for personal investigation. I invited Mr. LAMB, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and Mr. LEVER, of South Carolina, a distinguished member of that committee, to go with me to Mount Weather. We made a personal trip there and spent a day carefully examining Mount Weather and its operations, and if either of the gentlemen are present I will leave it to them to say whether they found anything that should be called to the attention of a congressional investigating committee.

Later, as some of the charges referred to the expenditure of the contingent funds in the Weather Bureau, I had the clerk of the committee, Mr. Crawford, spend almost a month in going over their accounts for a full year, calling upon Mr. Zappone, representing the Department of Agriculture, to submit the original competitive bids and the vouchers upon which the supplies were bought, and comparing them. After spending, as I say, almost a month in going over these expenditures of the Weather Bureau, Mr. Crawford reported back that everything, so far as the bookkeeping or methods of purchasing supplies were concerned, was perfectly straight and square.

I selected a list of the newspapers in the United States that were handling the Weather Bureau maps and publishing them, and I had the committee clerk write to every such paper in the United States, asking the editor what kind of service they received from the Weather Bureau, whether or not they had any suggestions or charges to make in regard to a change of it.

In every instance they came back in their replies to the effect that the weather map was appreciated by their subscribers, and they protested against any change whatever that might interfere with the service which the Weather Bureau was giving to them.

Wishing to make a further test, I asked the Representatives of districts within my own State to give me lists of representative persons living in their districts to whom I could write letters of inquiry, asking them as to whether the weather service was satisfactory. I received from my colleagues lists from their districts in our State, and I wrote a letter to each person on those lists, and I have their replies.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I suggest to the gentleman that a happy compromise might be reached between himself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] by striking out the word "Bureau" in the resolution. There is no question but that the abominable weather that we have had this year ought to be investigated. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. If it were not for the fact that we have our corn planted, I would accept that in a moment.

In every instance the replies which came back from Indiana were either one of two kinds—either that they were entirely satisfied with the service or else that they wanted a service extended to them that would be equal in the rural districts to the service that was received in the city.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not refer to this further, except to say that at this stage in the preliminary examination of the Weather Bureau the Wiley hearing came. It was thought at that time that the great importance of this hearing demanded a full committee, and we accordingly discontinued this work on the Weather Bureau and took up the Wiley hearing, which continued until January, when we made our report to the House. After making this report I called the committee together and submitted the question whether it would take up the Weather Bureau or the Forestry Bureau, and Judge FLOYD of Arkansas offered the following resolution on February 3, 1912:

Resolved, That the chairman be, and he hereby is, authorized to request Mr. Graves, Chief of Forestry Bureau, to appear and present to the committee a full detailed statement of the expenditures in his department.

That became the order of business to be pursued by the committee by a unanimous vote of the committee. But before we had time to take up that question certain Members of the House appeared before the committee and asked us to investigate charges pertaining to the Everglades in Florida, so that this order of business was displaced, and we went to work on the investigation of the Everglades matter. Before the investigation of the Everglades matter was concluded a resolution was introduced in the House to investigate the meat service, and we now have that on hand.

Now, here comes a request to investigate by special committee the Weather Bureau, charging that the present committee has failed to do its duty. I want to say to this House that I regard the power given to the investigating committees to be intended just as much to protect the reputation and service of a faithful public official as it is to find out anything that is wrong in the public service. [Applause.] I want to say that a man who is a Member of this House who will introduce a resolution charging that the committee has not made any examination of the Weather Bureau and charging that a great bureau of this Government is not giving efficient service to the people of the United States, if he has not taken more time and devoted more effort to the task of finding out the truth of the charges regarding the Weather Bureau than he has with respect to the truth of the charges against this committee, he puts himself into one of two classes, either that of a man who is easily misled, or else that of a man who is willing to give currency to charges that have absolutely no foundation in fact. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I want to say further that I would not have spoken about this matter if it had not been for the injustice to the membership of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. We have given the greatest latitude to every person who has appeared before us with any grievance whatever, and my friend the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLAON], who sits here, is a member of the committee, and I ask him to correct me if it be not a fact that every person who has appeared there with a grievance has been invited to tell the committee without any restriction whatever anything which he thought reflected upon the public service? This committee has taken many hundred pages of testimony and has devoted more hours to this duty than almost any committee in the House. Part of the time we have sat daily, and frequently we have had two sessions a day.

Upon this showing to the House I am perfectly willing to rest. If this House wishes to order a special committee of investigation, I shall be quite content; but I am not willing to have a Member of this House stand upon the floor and introduce a resolution reciting alleged statements about the action of this committee which have absolutely no foundation in fact. [Applause.]

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. AKIN of New York. To reply to the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I ask unanimous consent to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it desirable to enter into a discussion of the Weather Bureau this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. AKIN of New York. If the gentleman will withhold his objection, I will state what I have to say in three or four words.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York does not want as much time as he first stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. AKIN of New York. For two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to go back into this matter and dig up the stuff to make a proper reply, but I want to say that I am going to stand on my resolution.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. Before doing that the Clerk will report the section to which it is offered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Clerk has read the first paragraph, and I understand the gentleman from New York offers his amendment to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GARNER. The first paragraph has already been read.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order, and I shall make it constantly until there is order. In the confusion we can hear nothing. I do not want to lecture the House, but gentlemen engage in conversation, and others can scarcely get near enough, Member to Member, to hear what is going on. I hope that order may be kept.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenues, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes, and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, $225,000, together with the balance unexpended July 1 next of the appropriation made for these purposes for the fiscal year 1912.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, owing to the fact that the House indulged me yesterday for about an hour discussing this particular amendment, which restores the Tariff Board to this bill, it is not my purpose this morning to take time for the further discussion of the amendment which I have offered. I simply desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the amendment is to continue the appropriation for the work of the Tariff Board, which has been carrying on its work during the past two years, and further to call the attention of the House to the fact that the language of the proposed amendment is precisely that which has been carried in the current law during the past two years. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not yield time.

Mr. MALBY. Very well, then; I will yield the floor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio that he may proceed for 10 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from New York has stated, the effect of the amendment will be to continue the Tariff Board in existence for a year after the 1st of next July. Should the bill as it stands be passed, the Tariff Board will cease to exist on the 1st of next month. This bill represents the culmination of the attack made by the Democratic Party upon the tariff commission plan. Unsuccessful while the Republican Party was in control of this House, in securing the abolition of the Tariff Board on its merits, they propose now, that the keys of the Treasury are in their hands, to accomplish their purpose by the simple but highly effective method of withholding the appropriation.

The reason for withholding this appropriation can be but one of two, either because it is a part of the cheese-paring policy of false economy, applied to some of the most important branches of this Government, that if carried through will inevitably result in crippling them, or else it is because the information that has so far been furnished to this House by the Tariff Board has not only not assisted but has proved absolutely inimical to the Democratic policy of tariff making.

Nobody regrets more than I, Mr. Chairman, that the tariff commission plan should have been made a party issue. We did not make it so on this side of the House. The members of the Tariff Board have not made it a party issue. Their reports have been unanimous, although two of the members are as tried and true believers in the Democratic faith as any man that sits upon this floor. You, yourselves, gentlemen, made it a party issue, or at least the great majority of you did when you trampled over some of your ablest leaders last year, and we upon this side propose to fight it out to a finish.

In supporting this amendment, and I am confident that everyone on this side of the aisle will support it, we are fighting not alone for the preservation of the Tariff Board. We are contending for a more important principle, the principle that no revision of the tariff will be again undertaken and carried through except in accordance with complete, accurate, and scientific information with regard to all the schedules, to be furnished as it only can be furnished by a permanent, nonpartisan, independent tariff commission.

Of course the present board is not that; it has not the power it ought to have. It is not responsible, as it should be at all times, to Congress; and above all it has not the enduring nature that any great Government commission should have in order to properly carry out its functions. But it is the best possible under the circumstances, and we of the Republican Party do not propose that the Tariff Board shall be consigned to an early grave if we can help it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The history of the tariff commission movement is brief and simple. Some years ago thinking men of this country began to realize that the American tariffs, Democratic as well as Republican, have never in many respects been scientifically made; that some of our schedules, both in Democratic and Republican bills, have been the result, not so much of action based upon accurate and scientific information as of logrolling and trading between interested parties.

A few years ago a nation-wide association was formed, known as the National Tariff Commission Association, with a membership of men in all walks of life, whose purpose it has been to direct public sentiment toward the creation of a permanent tariff commission. A number of bills were introduced in both Houses of Congress looking to that end. I myself introduced a bill, which embodied, as I believe, the best features of all the bills, notably those introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. That bill was indorsed by the National Tariff Commission Association, and it met the approval of the President of the United States. It was gone over by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee and modified in some respects. It was then presented to the full committee, and after a consultation among the Democratic members they suggested an amendment, which we of the majority very glady adopted, and the bill was reported unanimously by the full Committee on Ways and Means, except only that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] reserved the right not to support the bill on the floor of the House. When the bill reached the floor it was discovered that a large majority of gentlemen on that side of the House were opposed to the Tariff Board idea, and while the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], now the honored Speaker of this House, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], now leader of his party, stood manfully by their guns, they were run over by the majority of their party, led by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. The bill received a solid Republican vote in the House. It received a solid Republican vote in the Senate, with several immaterial amendments added, which its friends here were perfectly willing to accept; but owing to the congested condition of business in the Senate, the bill did not reach this House until the morning of the 4th of March. It reached here, however, in ample time to have been passed, had not a filibuster been entered upon by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. [Applause on the Republican side.] Every parliamentary device possible—and no one knows the art of parliamentary procedure better than the gentleman from New York—was resorted to. Roll call succeeded roll call. The hours flew by, until the question simply was whether the Congress should expire by lapse of time and the appropriation bills fail or whether the Tariff Board bill should be abandoned. At that point, and not till then, we, the friends of that bill upon the floor of this House, threw up our hands and allowed it to die. That is the history of events, Mr. Chairman, and it shows that the responsibility for defeating the permanent Tariff Board lies solely at the door of the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to yield if I can have a few minutes more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think we can get the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman if he would not, for the sake of having the record complete, put into his statement the fact that in violation of a direct rule of the House, which says that a conference report shall be in order at any time except during a roll call, and so forth, on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, and on the action of the then Speaker of the House, Mr. CANNON, a roll call on the question of the Tariff Board bill was stopped in its midst in order that a conference report on an appropriation bill might be considered, and that thereby it was made impossible to have a final vote upon the Tariff Board matter.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly well aware of the fact that one of the final roll calls was interrupted. Nobody regretted it more than I did.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Nobody regretted it more than I, and I do not propose to express an opinion as to whether it was right or not, but the plain fact is that the roll call would never have been interrupted had not that filibuster been undertaken to prevent the passage of the Tariff Commission bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, there never would have been the possibility of a filibuster if a hostile party at the other end of the Capitol had not held the matter until the very last day, and if there had not been at least permissive action on the part of the Republican leaders upon that side, aiding in the delay of the consideration of the Tariff Board bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to hear the gentleman from Kentucky now speak with regret of its defeat.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I have always been and am now in favor of a proper tariff board, and my position is not a sudden conversion when I wanted an excuse to delay a real revision of the tariff, like some of the leaders on the other side. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman to come over here on this side of the aisle, where he will be welcomed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I still want to be sincere in my attitude in regard to a tariff commission.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The fact is that the Tariff Board bill reached this House about 8 o'clock in the morning. We had practically four hours in which to pass it, if it had not been delayed by a Democratic filibuster and killed, and it does not lie in the mouth of any gentleman on that side of the House to say that it was not killed and intended to be killed by the Democratic Party. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In view of the fact that the gentleman's party tried to pass a bill creating a tariff board on the last day of the session, after 16 years' control of Congress, does the gentleman think the country will believe that his party was very serious? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I am not responsible for the actions of my party [laughter on the Democratic side] in the Senate of the United States, but you were responsible for the action of your party when that bill came to this House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, the gentleman knows that bill arrived at the House at 8 o'clock in the morning. The Committee on Rules, the night before, agreed to the most drastic rule ever drawn, yet that bill was not called up until half or three-quarters of an hour later. If it had been called up when it came over and if it had been as skillfully engineered as any other legislation, it might easily have been enacted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand my friend the gentleman from New York is now apologizing for the part he took?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not favor it then and I do not favor it now. I am not like some recent converts, who, like Saul, saw a sudden light. I still have some convictions, and I am against a tariff board designed to delay relief to the American people from the burdens of an iniquitous tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. And so are the rest of us, Mr. Chairman, and because the Tariff Board means no such thing the Republican Party stood and now stands for a permanent tariff board, while the Democratic Party stood against it and is now against it. [Applause on the Republican side.] The responsibility for the failure of this legislation, the responsibility for the fact that there is no permanent tariff board in this country, lies at the doors of the Democratic Party.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not need light.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But after this bill was defeated there still remained a Tariff Board, a board of three, appointed by the President under the authority conferred upon him by the Payne law. He proceeded at once to enlarge and reorganize this board, so as to make it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to trespass on the indulgence of my colleagues, but I would like to have five minutes more time, as I have been so frequently interrupted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection, but it depends upon how many gentleman on that side desire to speak.

Mr. MADDEN. We are all going to talk on it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. However, if the gentleman claims the paternity of this recent Republican doctrine, he should have an opportunity to justify it, if it can be justified.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am greatly obliged to the gentleman. As I said, the President proceeded at once to reorganize and enlarge this board, so as to make it as nearly as possible, both as to functions and as to personnel, what it would have been had the permanent tariff-board bill passed. And I say, Mr. Chairman, it is to the enduring credit of the President of the United States that he made it possible for this country to receive in the brief existence that this board has enjoyed reports which exceed in thoroughness, accuracy, and value to the American people all that we had had in our previous existence as a Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now we are asked to abolish this board in the very heyday of its usefulness, when it is fully organized and equipped to make further investigations of the tariff schedules. We are asked to forego the opportunity to have further information with regard to how much it costs to produce here and abroad articles in which we are in active competition with the world. We are asked to forego the opportunity to find out anything more about labor conditions here and abroad, about working hours, conditions in the factories, wages—conditions, in short, which it is absolutely necessary for us to know if we are to properly safeguard the interests of American workingmen. Gentlemen upon that side, in seeking to bolster up the weakness of their position have inveighed vigorously against the Tariff Board, and then they have turned around and said with equal emphasis that the tariff reports justified the bills that they have brought in. Only the other day the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], who is now in the public eye largely by virtue of the fact that he is the only avowed candidate for Vice President known to be at large [laughter on the Republican side], after a most vehement attack upon the trustworthiness and accuracy of the Tariff Board report upon the wool schedule, said that it absolutely justified the Democratic wool bill. There is just about as much sense in that, Mr. Chairman, as knocking down a man because he calls you a name and then hugging him to your bosom because you admit that the name he called you was justified. The trouble is that the Tariff Board stands in your way, gentlemen. You do not want the kind of information that it has furnished, the kind of information that contributes to the sum of human knowledge.

You want a sort of select information, if you want any at all, information of your own choosing which will justify some of your peculiar theories. That is the reason you oppose a tariff board. You may succeed now in abolishing this board and proceed with your haphazard revision of the tariff schedules based upon ignorance of the facts, upon prejudice, party exigency, and geography, but I warn you that you are only postponing the inevitable. The people of this country will never support a tariff revision made upon these principles. The permanent tariff board is bound to come. And it will come through the medium of the party that has stood for it in the past and stands for it now. It will come through the medium of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to be recognized. I do not care to discuss the merits of the resolution at this time, but I would be glad to be recognized on another proposition. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] refers to an incident which happened during the last 30 minutes prior to 12 o'clock on the 4th day of March of last year at the close of the Sixty-first Congress. I recollect the incident very well, and if the committee will bear with me I want to say a word about the conditions.

There had been for some time filibustering proceedings in progress—determined and persistent. It was perfectly evident in the condition in which the House found itself that one of two things would fail, either the bill referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], creating a permanent tariff board, or the sundry civil appropriation bill, carrying, for almost all branches of the public service, in round numbers, $140,000,000.

A roll call was then in progress. At the end of the first calling of the roll the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, who was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, rose in his place to a question of the highest privilege. He was recognized and presented the final conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Senate had agreed to it, as I recollect, and it only remained for a vote of the House to send that bill in the last hour to the President for his signature. There was talk then, generally, about a special session of Congress. Frankly, as a Member of the House and a citizen of the United States, I did not desire, as one individual, to see a special session of Congress. I knew that if the sundry civil bill failed a special session of Congress must come or the Government stop, practically. It would be inevitable. In that kind of a filibustering condition, where under the rules of the House the Speaker in the presence of a filibuster is practically what he was then alleged to be all the time, a czar, he was responsible first to himself, then to the House and the country, when he could hold under those conditions any motion as out of order as a dilatory motion.

I recognized the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, by halting the roll call. "The letter killeth and the spirit maketh alive." Under such conditions those clothed temporarily with power were justified in action that would ordinarily not be justifiable if a filibuster had not been in progress, and if we had not been in the last hour of the session——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more. I have almost finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. The alternative was presented to the presiding officer of the House, in that condition, to choose. I do not know whether the permanent Tariff Board bill then before the House would have been enacted or not within the few remaining minutes before the expiration of the Sixty-first Congress. I had then and have now my serious doubts, but I knew if it did pass it would be at the expense of the defeat of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and that a special session of Congress would be inevitable. I was satisfied the House, if it had the opportunity, would prefer to pass the appropriation bill rather than pass the Tariff Board bill, and by my ruling I gave the House the opportunity to pass the appropriation bill. Under the same circumstances, if again I was Speaker of this House, I would do the same thing. I have no apologies to make for it. I did believe then if the sundry civil appropriation bill passed there would be no extraordinary session. But an extraordinary session came. I do not believe there is anybody upon this side of the House that does not regret that it came, and I doubt if there is anybody on that side of the House that glorifies in the fact that it came. I want to say this much, and in conclusion, that conscientiously I performed my duty then and justify it now. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to pass upon the motives of the distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat, but the fact remains that the assumption of authority that he has just stated he took upon himself and which he attempts to justify was made in the face of one of the plainest rules that was ever written into the parliamentary law of the House of Representatives. And any Member supposed to know anything at all about the rules would be presumed to know the binding effect of this rule. One of the quarrels that this side of the House and that the American people have had with the distinguished gentleman has been upon that same assumption, that whenever, in his judgment, it was warranted he was at liberty to disregard the rights of the Representatives of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the rule of that Congress, and the rule of preceding Congresses, and the rule of this Congress, provides that the presentation of reports from committees of conference shall always be in order except when the Journal is being read, while the roll is being called, or while the House is dividing on any proposition. In the case at issue the roll was being called. There was an express provision that prohibited its being stopped. And yet the gentleman, because he did not desire an extra session, because he thought that a particular bill should be considered, violated that plain rule, and by its violation the vote on the Tariff Board could not be taken within the time left to the Congress of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the record. I make no statements as to the gentleman's motives. He himself has told you why he acted. I present to the country the facts as to the rules of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think they would have had time before 12 o'clock on that day for the roll to have been called on the Senate amendments and the Senate amendments agreed to if this conference report had not displaced the completion of the roll call?

Mr. SHERLEY. My own judgment is that there would have been; but it was claimed that there was not sufficient time.

Mr. MANN. There was not sufficient time.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the gentleman's opinion. Maybe the wish was the father to the thought in the gentleman's case, like that of a number of other gentlemen on that side.

Mr. MANN. I will explain that in my own time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course it is open to explanation, and in need of it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, I merely want to say that there is another rule of this House that gives the Speaker extraordinary power in the presence of a filibuster.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman must not take up my time with a statement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want it.

Mr. CANNON. Just a word or two. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire to ask it in my own right. I only want a word, and then I will yield the floor to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask two minutes of time, part of which I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I again say there is a rule of the House also that gives extraordinary power to the Speaker in the presence of a filibuster. Under the spirit of the rule and in the fact that a conference report could even halt a motion to adjourn; under all the conditions, administering the rules as it was my duty to do, I took the action that I did.

The gentleman travels out of his way to say that whenever I desired anything as Speaker of the House and generally, I was charged with "czarism." I call on the gentleman, and I call on the Members of this House, to bear me out in this statement, that in courtesy to both sides of the House and in courteous administration of the House, to the best of my judgment, almost invariably approved by the House, under ordinary conditions every rule, in spirit and in letter as well, was given full play. But he who would sacrifice the interests of the country, he who would halt in the then condition of the House in taking the responsibility that I took would, in my judgment, fail of the performance of his duty, and I again say I have no apologies to make. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, it so happens that the highest right that is reserved to the representatives of the people in the House of Representatives is the right of a roll call. The Constitution guarantees it. No rule can take it away. And in order that the constitutional guaranty may be made plain in every case, so that no possible excuse can be offered, the rule that I have read to the committee was invoked.

I again say—not questioning the patriotism of the gentleman or the motives which prompted his action, but questioning the wisdom of an action that puts the judgment of a man as to a crisis in front of the country before the plain letter of the law, which should control a deliberative body [applause on the Democratic side]—this is a government, or should be, of law and not of men. And again I submit the issue to the people—of the rules of the House having supremacy as against the judgment of a Speaker, no matter how patriotic, as to the need to disregard them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I am not so much interested—though the matter is an interesting one—in fighting over this ancient parliamentary battle as I am in the matter which is immediately before the House, and I want to bring the minds of the committee back to that question.

The proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is to abolish the present executive Tariff Board by refusing to appropriate the money necessary to continue its operations during the next fiscal year. The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY], as contained in his amendment, is to continue the present executive Tariff Board by appropriating in this bill the exact amount which was appropriated a year ago for that board for the work of the present fiscal year.

I am against the amendment. I am for the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations, because I am against an executive tariff board.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us what kind of a tariff board he is in favor of?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; I will say what I am in favor of before I sit down.

In my judgment there is neither warrant nor excuse under the Constitution, nor justification, reason, or necessity under the present conditions in business and its relations to the tariff, for an executive tariff board. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The present board was conceived in the desire of American manufacturers to fasten upon this country in perpetuity a high protective-tariff policy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was born in a plain and clear usurpation of executive authority. [Applause.] And its short and eventless life has been crowned with the purpose of delaying the execution of the people's judgment.

Mr. Chairman, it deserves to die. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It meets that deserved fate very properly at the hands of the Democratic Party, which believes neither in a high protective policy nor in the usurpation of executive authority nor in delay in the execution of the people's will. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has criticized this method of killing the Tariff Board. Whatever may be said upon the merits of the proposition, it seems to me there is no just criticism to be found in the method which has been adopted to bring this institution to an end. As far as its present powers are concerned, the powers which it has exercised during the past two years, it has derived them from an appropriation bill; and an appropriation bill having been its place of birth, it is entirely proper that an appropriation bill should be its winding sheet. [Applause.]

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that I am opposed to an executive tariff board. I am not one of those, if there be any such, who believe that a tariff bill can be written without expert assistance. There is no man in this House who has ever been engaged in the preparation of a tariff bill but will freely and frankly admit that he has availed himself of all the expert assistance at his command.

I would favor the establishment of a nonpartisan board composed of statisticians and experts upon tariff matters, named by and working under the direction of the House of Representatives. Since the foundation of the Government the Committee on Ways and Means has been charged with the duty of preparing revenue legislation which, under the Constitution, must originate in this House. The expert assistance necessary to prepare such legislation affecting all kinds of revenue ought to be at the command of that committee. It has always employed such assistance and it always will, whether there is an outside tariff board or not. While such a corps of experts ought not to be partisan, they ought to work at the direction and under the control of that branch of the Government which is constantly in truest sympathy with the prevailing sentiment of the people upon the important questions affecting taxation. The very reason which prompted the framers of the Constitution to vest in the House of Representatives the exclusive power of originating revenue legislation—that reason being that this House is quickly responsive to the public will, and by the frequent election of its Members can constantly be made so—is a sufficient argument to sustain such a board solely as an adjunct to the lawmaking body.

It is not because we would not have this assistance in preparing Democratic revenue measures that we cut off this tariff board, but it is because this executive tariff board has demonstrated, by reason of the manner of its appointment and the purpose for which it was created, that its findings and facts, so called, will not receive consideration at the hands of the Congress, no matter which party is in power, in the writing of a tariff bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to have 10 minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMER. Under the Constitution legislation of all kinds must originate in the Congress. It must be initiated here. The President, of course, has the power of recommendation. He has the added negative power in legislation of the veto, but it was not intended that he should initiate legislation in the form in which it would go through the Congress. No President, with very few exceptions, has ever undertaken to send down here any bill which he desired to have passed. President Cleveland did it once. President Taft did it perhaps indirectly a couple of times, but with those exceptions it has almost never been done. The legislative branch of the Government would resent it if it were done.

But what applies to general legislation applies with peculiar force to revenue legislation, because under the Constitution that legislation must originate not only in the Congress, but in this body. And I declare, Mr. Chairman, that as long as that remains so, although the House of Representatives will be glad to avail itself of such information as the executive department may collect in and about its regular duties as an executive branch of the Government, it will never avail itself of information furnished to it by the executive branch of the Government for the purpose of legislating, and the history of both parties in this House bears out that contention.

The present Tariff Board, which has been in existence nearly three years, has satisfactorily demonstrated only one thing, and that is its utter and absolute uselessness as an adjunct of the lawmaking power. It has made two reports—that covering the woolen schedule of the tariff law and another covering the cotton schedule of the tariff law. Those reports were made to the President and transmitted to the House. Then there was the report of the Tariff Board in relation to the pulp-and-paper schedule, but so far as this House has had anything to do with them there have been but the two reports, covering the schedules on wool and cotton.

We have had within the past week a striking illustration of the fact that the House of Representatives, without regard to party, will never take the work of this Tariff Board with anything like the seriousness that some gentlemen contend that it deserves. It is in the very nature of things, it is in the very nature of men, not to have that confidence in men appointed by others which they would have in the findings of men appointed by themselves. It is absolutely and entirely natural, and it has been demonstrated within the past week. The Democratic Party, through its majority on its Committee on Ways and Means, has introduced into the House, with a unanimous report of the majority members of that committee, a bill to revise the cotton schedule of the tariff law.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman recalls the fact that the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee reported a chemical bill, to reduce the duties on chemicals, does he not?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Two chemical bills.

Mr. PALMER. No; only one bill.

Mr. COOPER. Two bills.

Mr. PALMER. We reported only one bill revising the chemical schedule, and that was at the present session.

Mr. COOPER. Did not the Democratic House pass a bill last session revising the chemical schedule?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; but that was a different matter.

Mr. COOPER. That is one bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And it was reported favorably by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. COOPER. It was reported favorably by the Democratic Party in this House and it was defended on this floor as a scientific revision, and yet during this present session the Ways and Means Committee reported another bill revising the chemical schedule based on an entirely different theory; an entirely different bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PALMER. I thought, Mr. Chairman, I yielded to the gentleman for a question. I did not yield to him to inject a speech into my speech.

Mr. COOPER. I will ask the question now, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be diverted into a discussion of the chemical schedule. As to that, everybody knows the situation. The chemical bill brought in by the Committee on Ways and Means during the present session and passed by this House and now in the Senate was defended by us as a scientific revision of the schedule. We were not the fathers of the chemical amendment to the cotton bill at the last session of Congress, and while we voted for the entire bill at the time in order to pass the cotton bill, it was distinctly stated that at the first opportunity we would bring into this House a revision of the chemical schedule.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PALMER. I do not care to yield further, Mr. Chairman, for a discussion of the chemical schedule.

I was saying that while the Democratic Party, through its majority representatives on the Ways and Means Committee, had brought in a unanimous report covering a revision of the cotton schedule recently, there was one member of the committee, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who prepared a bill which he declares is a revision of the cotton schedule in exact accordance with the findings of the Tariff Board.

The gentleman from Connecticut is one of the ablest and most studious men in this House. [Applause.] I have no doubt that from his point of view he understands the tariff question as well as any Member here. He declared to his colleagues upon that committee that his bill was a revision fixing the rates at exactly those which could be deduced from the findings of the Tariff Board, and these other gentlemen on the committee, strong adherents of the Tariff Board, now earnestly favoring its continuance, like my colleague [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], and all the rest, forgot their respect for the Tariff Board and disputed its accuracy in these matters and refused to vote for his bill in the committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. HILL's bill, based on the Tariff Board report, received his own vote and no other.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. I will.

Mr. McCALL. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is going to give what occurred in the committee he ought to give it correctly. The other gentlemen said they had not had an opportunity to read the bill of the gentleman from Connecticut and therefore did not want to sign. Although it is out of order for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to go into the discussion that took place in the committee, if he insists upon giving it he ought to give it fairly.

Mr. PALMER. I will give it fairly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is going to refer to matters in the committee, and I shall not make a point of order upon it, will the gentleman say whether either bill was read in the committee before the committee acted?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; both bills were read in the committee.

Mr. MANN. In the committee?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. HILL's bill was read in the committee and the other was the same bill which had been read many times in the committee.

Mr. MANN. It never had been read in the committee.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois was not in the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is true, but I know the bill was not read in the committee at either time.

Mr. PALMER. I say, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] will say, and nobody will disbelieve him in the matter, that his bill was read in the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HILL. It was.

Mr. PALMER. Before these colleagues of his refused to vote for the bill.

Mr. HILL. It was read fully, but I do not think the Democratic bill was ever read, either in this session or in the extra session.

Mr. MANN. That is what I stated.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; the gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken. It never was read.

Mr. PALMER. It was read in the committee and in the Committee of the Whole and it was read in the country and approved everywhere. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. But it was never read in the Committee on Ways and Means, and probably has not been read by the gentlemen who are applauding sentiments respecting it.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] mildly calls me to order for stating what occurred in the committee, and ordinarily I would hesitate to do that, but upon this Tariff Board proposition we have heard dozens of times from the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means what happened in the committee in the Sixty-first Congress; the last time as late as this morning, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] referred to the matter. So I am justified in referring to it, and I am not criticizing these gentlemen for refusing to approve this bill, drawn in accordance with the findings of the Tariff Board. I am simply quoting their action to show how natural it is for men to refuse to follow an executive bureau in a matter of this kind, and these gentlemen are perfectly consistent with themselves when they refuse to vote for a cotton bill framed upon the Tariff Board's findings, because it was only three years ago when my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], said in this House:

> There will in no event be any tariff commission. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.] The men who made the Constitution intrusted to the Representatives of the people elected every two years the exclusive prerogative of initiating revenue measures. During all our history the House of Representatives has jealously guarded that prerogative, never surrendered it, and both Democratic and Republican Representatives in this respect, standing on a common platform, never will.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman continuing for 10 minutes?

Mr. PALMER. I do not know that I shall use that much.

Mr. MANN. I think five minutes of time is all that should be granted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five minutes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, at that time my colleague from Pennsylvania did not anticipate what is the situation now, that we would have a Democratic House to originate tariff legislation while there was a Republican Executive. About the same time, a little after the Dalzell pronunciamento, the then leader of the Republican Party on the floor, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], when asked about a revision of the tariff at that time and whether a tariff commission would be acceptable to the Committee on Ways and Means and the House of Representatives in framing legislation, said:

> I think the signs of the times are that next winter this committee will be forming a tariff bill. The question is whether the committee should receive the aid of a tariff commission. We shall invite in all the aid we can get—all the information we can get—and our power is great to send out and get it. We know where to get the Government experts for information about all the intricacies of the operations of the various schedules of the tariff. We know where to get the various decisions as to what the language means in the different schedules. We know where to get the information from manufacturers or merchants or mechanics the country over. Shall we get this information at first-hand or shall we delegate that power to another body of men appointed as a tariff commission? Speaking for one and from what I have seen of the formation of tariff bills, the committee, no matter what the tariff commission might report, would seek its information at first-hand.

But he winds up that speech by an expression of his deliberate judgment—

> You probably have gathered from the tone of my remarks that I am not able to see the wisdom of a tariff commission.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

And so when the gentleman from New York was framing a tariff law he was not standing for a tariff commission, and now the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] says that we are opposed to it because it stands in our way, as the gentleman from New York feared, perhaps, it might stand in his way. It was intended to stand in our way [applause on the Democratic side], and because it has consistently stood in the way of an honest revision of the tariff downward we propose to wipe it out of existence. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I said a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, that this Tariff Board was conceived in the minds of the manufacturers of the country, who wanted to fasten a high protective-tariff policy upon us. I shall not stop now in the few moments I have to show how it was conceived, but I find upon my desk this morning, as probably every Member did, a clipping reprinted from the Dry Goods Economist, May 25, 1912, entitled "Demand its continuance"—referring to the Tariff Board—and this paper gives a list of the organizations which originally started the agitation for a tariff board. It names the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Retail Dry Goods Association, the Wholesale Dry Goods Association, the American Hardware Corporation, the Merchants' Association of New York, and others. The writer says that the reason these strong friends of the purchasing and consuming public, these great associations of manufacturers, have been anxious to have a tariff board is because the Members of Congress are too ignorant and too lazy to study the tariff question or pass upon these questions. Will you stand for that? Do you indorse the statement of the gentleman from Ohio reported in the newspapers some time ago that a majority of the majority on this side did not know the difference between an ad valorem and a specific duty? Do you believe any such rot as that? Yet that is the argument presented by the Dry Goods Economist, and such in the last analysis seems to be the reason advanced by most of its friends for the continuance of this institution. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when I witnessed the wild enthusiasm of the Democratic side of this House applauding the utterances of the Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, in regard to the tariff I have wondered. [Laughter.] When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] desires to arouse enthusiasm now on his side of the House on the tariff question he reads the utterances of his colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and I wondered whether Mr. DALZELL has become a low-tariff man or his colleague from Pennsylvania has become a high-tariff man. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And when I saw the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], with enthusiasm in every line of his face, wildly applauding the speech on the tariff question made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] I wondered whether the millennium had come. Mr. Chairman, a practical joke sometimes results in a tragedy. When the Ways and Means Committee by a unanimous vote in the last Congress recommended the passage of the bill establishing a Tariff Board some practical joker on the Democratic side, with no expectation of success and with no intention of gaining a victory, commenced some opposition, and before he knew he had accomplished more than he thought—he had lined up a majority on the Democratic side against the Tariff Board and the passage of a bill which no one desired to defeat at that time and which was passed in the House previously. It finally came back to the House on the 4th of March, two years ago, after an all-night session of the House, somewhat late in the morning, and that practical joker from Texas [Mr. GARNER] commenced opposition, or followed the opposition which he had commenced before, to the House agreeing to the Senate amendments, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], active, acute, bright in mind, well informed as to his rights under the rules, concluded that he would take part in that joke and prevent the House from agreeing to the Senate amendments and thereby defeat the bill to create a tariff commission. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] a few moments ago stated that the cause of the defeat of that bill was the action of the then Speaker in recognizing Mr. Tawney, of Minnesota, to present a conference report between the first and second call on a roll call. In the interest of history, at least, I think it is proper for me to say a word upon that point. Mr. Chairman, during my service in this House I never have seen the House reach a point so near personal conflict as came on that morning. The gentleman from New York began to filibuster. The tariff commission bill came from the Senate with a number of Senate amendments. It is the custom of this House on the 4th of March, so far as ordinary business is concerned, when it comes close to the hour of 12 o'clock, to move the hands of the clock back through some unknown and supposedly unseen agency.

But no one in the House would desire to move the hands of the clock back for the purpose of falsifying the record of time in order to pass a controverted bill in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will continue for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] commenced to filibuster on the bill. It was plainly impossible to call the roll on the passage of each of the Senate amendments—and a roll call could be demanded on every amendment—and complete the call before 12 o'clock. Thereupon the Committee on Rules reported a rule providing that the previous question should be considered as ordered upon a motion to agree to the Senate amendments in gross. And, under the filibuster, that had to be adopted by a roll call. The first call of the roll was had on that rule, and at the end of the first roll call the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, presented a conference report on the sundry civil bill and asked to have it considered.

I am familiar with the rule referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that a conference report can not interrupt a roll call. I was not familiar with it at that time, and no other Member of this House—and I make no exception—knew there was such a rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption? I beg to state I called the Speaker's attention to it and protested against his action, at the desk. I had to do it at the desk because I could not get recognition on the floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had recognition on the floor. The Members are applauding too quickly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman himself looked at the rules and found there was such a rule. And he went to the Speaker and I went to the Speaker and called his attention to this rule, the parliamentary clerk not then being at the Speaker's table. The gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, in asking for a consideration of the conference report, made a parliamentary mistake. I think the Speaker in recognizing him made a parliamentary mistake. The gentleman from Minnesota possibly made a tactical mistake, not supposing that the Democratic side would filibuster against the passage of the sundry civil bill, which they did, and which required a roll call. But even if that mistake had not been made, unfortunately it was not possible to have a final roll call on agreeing to the Senate amendments. When the motion on the roll call was carried, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], under the rules, made the point that he had a right to make a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Speaker sustained his right. Those who have charged this morning that the Speaker was unfair and autocratic should remember that on a matter which was then controverted and was then settled by the ruling of the Speaker, giving to the minority the right which they claimed, the Speaker recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to make a motion to recommit a bill because the rules seemed to provide for that. It was not possible to conclude that roll call and have another roll call on agreeing to the Senate amendments before the hour of 12 o'clock came. Gentlemen on both sides of the aisle were hot-tempered and bitter. In the midst of that controversy, trying to keep my judgment and trying to hold my temper, and believing it would be a serious catastrophe if a riot should occur in the House of Representatives when an effort should be made to turn back the clock, if that were made, and knowing that once the clock were turned back it would not be possible to pass these Senate amendments, I went on my own responsibility to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and other gentlemen on that side of the House, and stated to them that the clock would not be turned back for the purpose of passing any controverted proposition. And shortly after that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], seeing that it was not possible in the course of half an hour or more after 12 o'clock to agree finally to the Senate amendments, withdrew, in the midst of the roll call, the entire proposition by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. When that request was agreed to, the clock was turned back twice before the conference report had been enrolled and presented to the House. I am sorry that the tariff commission bill did not pass. But I recognized then and I recognize now the rights of a minority to pursue every parliamentary device which rules provide to defeat legislation, as the majority has the right to pursue parliamentary devices to enforce or pass legislation.

But I would much rather that the Tariff Board question should remain open for the people to decide than to have seen what on that day was imminent—a personal conflict between Members of the two sides of the House, each believing that it was right. The Speaker then, my colleague Mr. CANNON, is entitled to no criticism for what he did. He preserved the rights of the minority. If he had refused, in violation of the rules, to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on that day to make a motion to recommit, the tariff commission bill might be a law. But my colleague now acknowledges, like a man, and takes the responsibility of recognizing the conference report between the two roll calls. He does not play the "baby act," and he never does. But in point of fact both the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, and the Speaker in the chair were not familiar with the rule, which had not been invoked in practice probably in the course of a half century of time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so much for that. I was not very enthusiastic about a tariff board. But, with what little experience I have had in the House in the course of the preparation of one general tariff bill and a number of schedule tariff bills, I have reached the conclusion that the House can not in any way obtain too much information. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] says somebody accused the House of being ignorant or lazy. On tariff questions this House, on both sides, is in the main both ignorant and lazy. [Laughter.] No one pretends that the average individual Member of this House knows or studies the schedules or the rates on different items in different schedules in the main. The Ways and Means Committee itself does not do it. When the chemical tariff bill was presented to this House at this session there was one Member in the House who pretended to know in regard to it, and he was the one who had written the bill.

I will not blindly follow the report of a Tariff Board, whether it be an executive board, a legislative board, an independent board, or any other kind of a board. But why do you fear the information? If we on this side of the House shall have the next House, why do you oppose our desire to have the information? If, on the other hand, you on that side of the House shall have the next House, why, even if you want to throw the information in the wastebasket, do you oppose our having it? In fairness to the minority now, in fairness to the majority then if we shall be in the majority, and in fairness to the minority then if we shall then be in the majority in the organization of the House, you should give us a chance to acquire the information which we desire.

Mr. PALMER. Would you pay the same attention to it then, if you were in the majority, that the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means now are paying to the report of the Tariff Board on the cotton schedule?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when the Tariff Board's report on the wool schedule came out I read it, and read it again, and read it still again. Some other Members of the House did that. I think everybody will say that there was some information contained in that report, whether you agree with the information or not.

I am frank to confess that I have not read the report of the board on the cotton schedule. Up to within a few days ago it was my understanding, at least, and I think it was based upon information from authoritative sources, that the cotton schedule bill was not likely to come in at this session of Congress. I have no criticism because a change of policy, if there was a change, was made in that respect.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. The majority have full privilege in reference to that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The statement was made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that no cotton bill would be reported unless the Senate showed a disposition to enact final tariff legislation. It was on the authority of the Senate's action on the steel bill with the reciprocity amendment that a disposition was construed to exist in the Senate to pass tariff legislation. As a matter of fact, of course, everybody knows that the Senate's action means that there shall be no further tariff legislation.

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if he changed his mind, if he did change his mind. That is his right. I think it is not required that he shall announce his policy at all, and much less to the minority side of the House.

I went over very carefully with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], and in other ways, the wool bill which was offered by the minority in the House when the committee's wool bill was passed. Personally, while I have talked with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in regard to his bill and have examined casually his provisions, I have given no special examination to the provisions of his bill. While I have the highest regard for the gentleman from Connecticut and would much prefer to follow him on a tariff bill rather than some gentlemen on the Democratic side, we are not constituted on this side of the House so that we indorse proposed legislation without any examination.

On that side of the House a gentleman can prepare a tariff bill offhand, as the chemical bill was prepared, with no one knowing its contents except its author, and it will receive the enthusiastic support of all Democrats. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman please make an exception?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is no longer an ordinary Democrat. He is a sensible Democrat. [Laughter.] The gentleman has voted against nearly every party measure that has been brought into the House and has in that respect shown excellent judgment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Complaint is made because we do not take offhand the cotton bill prepared by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and presented to the Ways and Means Committee. It is easier for them. What do they do? They take offhand a bill prepared last summer by no one on this side knows whom. Who prepared the bill of last summer? In the light of all the information which you have received since last summer—and unless you are dummies you must have received some information—you have not dotted an "i" or crossed a "t" in the cotton bill. You learn nothing by experience. You acquire nothing by study. You add nothing by information.

Mr. PALMER. We were right the first time.

Mr. MANN. You simply follow what some ignoramus or gentleman or learned man has prepared and then blame us because we are not equally foolish. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to go very much into what happened at the end of the Sixty-first Congress. The attempt to defeat the Tariff Board bill was no practical joke, however. I resented its being reported by the aid of Democratic votes. I antagonized it in committee, in the House, and I antagonized it when it came from the Senate. If everybody else is so delicate about having attributed to him any responsibility for the failure of the Tariff Board bill, I am perfectly willing to have them place that responsibility on me, because I think that was one of the most meritorious things I have ever accomplished during my membership in the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] states pretty fairly what happened in the last day of that Congress. I have never seen such intense excitement here. There was danger of personal conflict. I was glad the bill was defeated. I protested against the action of Speaker CANNON in permitting the conference report on the general deficiency bill to be submitted in the way it was, because I believed it a violation of the rule.

But I wish to say that I have always been convinced that his action was in good faith as to his powers under the rules of the House. Whether that particular action or some other things made impossible agreement upon the conference report made no difference to me. I desired to defeat that bill. I resented some of what I considered at that time to be the arbitrary actions of the Speaker in depriving me of opportunities to delay a vote upon the bill. Considering the opportunities under the rules to delay matters, I do not believe that a vote could have been reached on the bill. I never believed that the Republican Party were sincere in that Congress in their attempt to enact a tariff board bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They had had control of Congress for more than 16 years. They reported their so-called tariff bill somewhat early in the session, and passed it through the House. They brought it back in the dying hours of the Congress.

Knowing the possibilities for delay under the rules, knowing that there were men who were determined to prevent the enactment of the law if it could be prevented, it requires more credulity than I have ever possessed to induce me to believe that the great majority of the Republicans were really sincere in their desire to enact the bill, and I am justified in that belief by the historic attitude not only of the Republican Party, but even of distinguished gentlemen now in the House and who have recently been in both Houses of Congress. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] himself said upon the occasion referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] when the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] made the statement which he quoted:

We had a Tariff Commission once, composed of very able men. They performed in the early eighties. We revised the tariff. I am told, Brother PAYNE, by those who were in that Congress, that they heard all the industries, and the report of the Tariff Commission was so voluminous that they did not even read it. * * * I fear greatly that you would turn into a debating school, just as we do in the House, and that there would be liable to be a majority and a minority report—maybe not; I should hope not—if this commission is constituted. * * * You say that Congress is not fully informed. Let me tell you something. I want to say that I do not believe there is a man in the United States who knows as much of the schedules and who is as well equipped for that work as the gentleman upon whose shoulder I lay my hand [Mr. PAYNE].

And after Mr. PAYNE had had his opportunity to revise the tariff, and after the country had pronounced its emphatic condemnation of the result of his efforts, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and gentlemen from every other hidebound Republican district where the protective industries have been fattening at the expense of the American people suddenly became convinced that it was highly desirable to have a tariff board, in order to furnish information to the Democratic Party in their revision of the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have opposed the Tariff Board because it is a futile waste of money. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was conceived for the purpose of preventing action on the tariff until the Republican Party might possibly patch up its differences. That was practically the statement of the President at Winona, but he was a poor prophet. He anticipated that the wounds would be healed in four years. It would be an indefinite period for the life of this commission if it were to be extended until the present differences in the Republican Party are healed and cooperation in its divided ranks again becomes possible. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 10 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the President did not originally anticipate that this should be a tariff board in the sense now contemplated, and I shall read from two statements to confirm that view. He said:

I do not intend, unless compelled or directed by Congress, to submit the results of these investigations, but to treat them merely as incidental facts brought out officially from time to time.

And Senator Hale pointed out in the Senate—and I shall put in the RECORD just what he said—the fact that he had thoroughly gone over the provision in the Payne-Aldrich bill, section 2, and that the provision in there was not to create a tariff board, but to enable the President to administer the maximum and minimum provisions of the law. Senator Hale said, on August 4, 1909:

When this subject came up, Mr. President, as it does in the urgent deficiency bill, I went over this whole question with the President as to his scope of duties. I showed to him that it was not intended to keep this subject open, but to confine him to the question of discriminations, discriminating duties, and discriminating processes by other powers. In framing the language of the item of appropriation that gives the President the amount of money that he asked, it has been confined strictly to the language I have recited as a part of the tariff act. I have no fear the President will undertake to exceed that. I do not believe that he will.

Then he said further:

But the Senate conferees found the House conferees a rock against any form, not only of tariff commission, but of any authority, that should be given for any officer of the Government to keep this subject open. * * * What is the business of the President under the maximum and minimum provisions? It is not to inquire into the condition of labor in other countries—the relative cost of labor there and here. He is limited to an inquiry as to the discrimination that is made by other countries against the United States. He so understands it. I understand that he so understands it. I do not believe and I do not expect and I do not fear that the President would seek to amplify this authority.

Speaking further, relative to possible changes of the Payne law, he said:

* * * It is not any tariff commission that will settle this question in the future. It will be Congress that will settle it; it will be the House primarily and the Senate secondarily; and no tariff commission will add 1 ounce of weight to the deliberations of the two bodies which must at least settle all these questions.

And yet within two months of these declarations the President stated that he construed the provision to authorize him to appoint a tariff commission. This so-called tariff commission has expended $550,000. It has completed the investigation and reported upon three schedules of the tariff law. There are 11 schedules still to be investigated and reported upon. This pending amendment proposes to reappropriate the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this year, although the President in his message, I think on the cotton report, stated that it would require $60,000 additional to complete the work of the commission during the present year.

I endeavored to ascertain how much more would be required to enable the commission to complete its work, and the best information that could be obtained from these gentlemen was that it would require at least $450,000. But by the time they had completed their work additional money would be required for additional investigations in order to keep it up to date.

I have heard gentlemen speak of the value of the reports of the Tariff Commission and the necessity for the information that the reports contained, and the importance to the Congress that the information should be before the House before tariff legislation is enacted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated that he has carefully examined the report on the wool schedule, and that it contained at least some information. It would be very difficult, Mr. Chairman, for a report of the size and volume of that report not to contain some information, but how valuable it is I shall not undertake to say.

But I shall quote a competent witness on this question, a man whom nobody upon that side will challenge as to his ability and knowledge and competency. Samuel S. Dale, recognized as one of the greatest textile experts of the country, and, if I be not misinformed, either the editor or connected with the Textile World Record, the recognized authority upon these questions, has prepared a most comprehensive analysis of the report of the Tariff Commission, so called, on the wool schedule, and a most illuminating analysis of the bill prepared by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I shall ask to have it printed as a part of my remarks, and I shall read to the House for its information at this time only the concluding paragraph of the paper, prepared by the most competent man on these questions in the United States:

In conclusion I desire to express my keen regret at having found the statement of fact in the report—

Referring to the report on the wool schedule—

deficient, and the conclusions generally erroneous. The Tariff Board's work on Schedule K may, nevertheless, serve a useful purpose by awakening interest in a question of great importance, provided the real character of the investigation is clearly understood.

So that the only value of this report, according to the most competent man in the United States to pass upon these questions, is that it may awaken some interest among the American people as to the necessity for removing the indefensible rates in the woolen schedule. Does anybody imagine that it necessitated an expenditure of $550,000 to convince the American people that any such revision was necessary?

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the Tariff Board because its purpose—not the purpose of the members of the board, but the purpose of those who created it—was to delay tariff revision. We all recall the veto messages of the President of the United States. He vetoed the tariff bills passed in the special session of this Congress upon the ground that, as the Tariff Board had not reported upon the various schedules affected, he was unable to state whether the bills as passed and presented to him afforded that measure of protection which the Republican platform promised to the protected industries of the country, which was a rate to equalize the difference in the cost of production here and abroad with a reasonable profit to the manufacturer; and he stated that he would not approve any bill revising or affecting the tariff which did not give that measure of protection to the protected industries.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, during that same session of Congress, with a report of the Tariff Board showing a difference in cost of producing print paper of $5.34 in this country and Canada, in the face of the Republican platform upon which he was elected, and after pledging himself not to approve legislation which did not afford that measure of protection, he signed the reciprocity bill, which contained a provision putting print paper upon the free list. In that way he has completely repudiated not only the reports of the Tariff Commission, but his own action in denying to the people of the United States relief from the iniquities of the present tariff law. Of what value is it to wait for these reports if the President is to play fast and loose with them himself? Who knows that he would be satisfied with a bill reducing rates to a point which even the board would concede was proper for the purpose merely of carrying out the Republican platform if, perchance, it would affect some industry which was peculiarly active in behalf of the Republican Party either before or after the nominations?

Mr. Chairman, the whole purpose of this scheme is to delay, to prevent relief to the people. So far as I am concerned, I believe that this side of the House is not only sufficiently patriotic, but that it has the courage and the information necessary to so revise the tariff as not only to meet the commendation of the American people, but to bring that relief to which they are entitled. In this coming campaign we shall face that issue confidently. The country may then determine whether it desires to delay, delay, delay in the interest of those who have been enriching themselves at the expense of the people or whether the people are prepared to approve the legislation thus far enacted by this House. To write such laws upon the statute books I believe the people will give us a sweeping victory in the next campaign. Upon the issue we are ready to abide the judgment of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle can justify themselves to the American people for striking down all legislation in reference to a tariff board by quoting some speeches that I made four or five years ago. I was opposed to a tariff board then. I believed that it was better for the parties who were to make a tariff and suggest rates to have the witnesses come before them, that they might examine them and see the witnesses themselves and their manner of giving evidence, especially parties who were interested, in order to get at the truth.

The committee over which I had the honor to preside were more faithful, spent more time, worked harder to get at the facts than any Ways and Means Committee of the House since I have been a member of that committee, now something over 23 years. But, Mr. Chairman, there were certain facts we could not get at. We could not get witnesses from the other side of the water; we could not examine them; we could not see their manner of testifying; and we could not ask them the questions that we desired to ask; and yet, hampered as we were, we ascertained more facts and obtained a better basis for formulating a tariff bill than any committee with which I have ever been connected before. Yet that experience convinced me that we needed something more. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is opposed to an executive tariff board. He promised the gentleman from Illinois to tell what kind of a one he wanted, but he forgot to say anything about it, although he wandered around for half an hour on the subject afterwards. An executive tariff board! Has this committee of this House ascertained a single fact that they did not get from an executive department of this Government in reference to the formation of a tariff unless some of them, perchance, may have read over a stray hearing that was had before the committee in 1909. If they have, they failed to show it to the House. Their reports have been voluminous, but you can not find anything in them that is not in a report of the census or some other executive branch of the Government. What does he mean; what kind of a tariff board is he for? He evidently wants to justify himself, because he knows the people of Pennsylvania and the people of this country want a tariff board. Why does not he mention the kind? Why does not he bring a bill in for a tariff board before the Committee on Ways and Means—he is an influential member there—and push it through the committee? Why did he vote against the bill I called up in the Committee on Ways and Means during this present session—identical with the bill that the majority of the House voted for and he voted for, if I am not much mistaken, in the last Congress during the closing hours?

Oh, how anxious he is, how very anxious he is for a tariff board or a tariff commission to gain information. Now, this Tariff Board has the power. It sent agents abroad to take testimony there. They had power to send agents over the United States to take testimony here. They presented a report on the wool bill that everybody who is competent to judge says was the greatest report ever made on any tariff subject in any country in the world, and this praise comes not alone from the people of the United States, but from men abroad who have made a study of these questions the work of their lifetime. That is what this board has done. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania says the Republican majority does not believe in this board. Why, it seems to be an impression even with some members of the Ways and Means Committee that this board suggested rates. They are doing nothing of the kind; very far from it. They do not suggest a rate for a tariff for revenue only reformer; they do not suggest a rate for the free trader and they do not suggest a rate to those of us who believe in the protection of American industries. It is true in the wool schedule they say if Congress adopts a certain rate upon the scoured content of wool other rates will follow as a corollary, on scoured wool and wools in various stages of manufacture the rate of tariff would be according to the weight of the wool, but they do not suggest any rates to Congress that Congress shall adopt, but all through their report they simply furnish the facts. It was suggested at the time I made that speech in the House that we should refer it to the board to bring in a bill. I said Congress never would submit to that, and it never will. I stand by that now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be given 10 minutes. [After a pause.] No objection is heard.

Mr. PAYNE. The Constitution gives to us the fixing of rates, but the Constitution does not state that we are to find out the facts in any given way. We can get at it ourselves; we can have a tariff board, a part of the executive portion of the Government. What kind of tariff board does the gentleman want? Now, the great difficulty in the Ways and Means Committee is this: The life of Congress is only two years. If the President calls us together as soon after the 4th of March as can be done, as he did in April during the formation of the tariff bill in 1909, still we have a very short time in which to formulate a bill and get it through Congress. We can not get all the evidence we want. I did want to revise the woolen schedule. I was earnest in it. I got all the facts together and laid them before the committee, but I could not get facts enough to convince gentlemen who have since read the wool report from this Tariff Commission and who agree now that I was partially right, at least, in what I wanted to do.

I had paid a little more attention perhaps to that than some others in the committee.

A tariff bill is not formed by any one man. I have been through two or three tariff formations. The chairman does not have his own way about everything. I think that perhaps I had my own way about the last bill as much as any chairman I ever served with, but I did not have my own way. The bill before the House even was not exactly the bill I would have framed if I had absolute power.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman state now that he is in favor of a tariff board and if it is his opinion it would have been better in 1909 to have created a tariff board and revised the tariff schedule by schedule in that way instead of the manner in which it was admitted to be dealt with?

Mr. PAYNE. I think if we had had the assistance of a tariff board that we still would have made a better bill than we did. Nobody will ever make a perfect bill. Nobody will ever report a bill with every item of which he agrees, because it must be a compromise.

Mr. HULL. Then the gentleman thinks the committee made a mistake in the manner in which they dealt with it in 1909?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not. I regard the present tariff law, as I have said before, and as you will acknowledge some day, as the best tariff law put on the statute books since 1850, and I am willing to meet any of you and debate on that question anywhere or any time, or with any other man in the United States, and I will prove it to you by the statistics of the Government. But we might have done better if we had had a tariff board at work a year or two before that. I did not know it then. I realize it now.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] says that we discredit the report of this Tariff Board. Well, we formed a wool bill. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and myself both had a good deal to do with the formation of that bill. We did not agree in all of the particulars. We disagreed on some. He had his way on some things, and I had my way on some other things, as the gentleman knows. When we got through with it, we got through with the best woolen schedule that was ever made up to the present date, without any quesion. We got through with the schedule, we reported a schedule to the committee, and it ought to have been adopted. You ought to have voted for it over there. We prepared a way to reduce the tariff on wool and woolens, and if you had accepted it it would have been a law to-day, and it would have been a substantial reduction on wool and woolens. What did you do with it? Beyond the one reading in the committee I doubt if any one of you ever read that bill through or ever considered it or have any knowledge of it, if not entirely ignorant of it and its contents to-day. I became discouraged. And when the cotton report came in I did not care whether the bill was prepared or not, so far as I was concerned. What was the use? It was like the man in Scripture, casting pearls before some neighbors or inhabitants in those days. It was of no use. I am not reflecting on you, gentlemen. I am simply saying it was as useless as was the casting of pearls in those days.

It met no response. I agree with the encomiums that have been placed upon my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I have been pretty close to him a good many years in tariff matters on the Ways and Means Committee, and I think perhaps he and I were more of one way of thinking in the formation of the tariff act of 1909 than perhaps any other two members on the committee. He is a man of great industry. I do not always agree with all he says and all his conclusions, and, of course, he does not agree with mine always, but that does not prevent my appreciation of him. But I never yet have taken a tariff bill on the strength of any one man's judgment, and I never will. Now, this bill was brought before the committee, and I never heard it read until I heard it read in committee. It was the only cotton bill that has been read in the committee at this session of Congress. My friends on the other side expressed a desire to hear it read, and I stated to the committee, and I will state that now, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated some things that occurred there, that that was the first time I had read that bill of Mr. HILL's. Perhaps it was my own fault. I was not prepared to say I was for that bill or that I concurred in the judgment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that it was just exactly in accordance with the Tariff Board report. I criticized it in the particular that it had abolished specific duties and had nothing but ad valorem duties in it. It may be that after a study of it I might have acceded to that, but I had not had the study. I believe in specific duties wherever we can have them, because they stop fraud, and that is the best judgment of every man who has had the administration of a tariff act since Walker, and Walker was the only exception.

I was not prepared to vote for it, and I so announced to the committee, and I did not vote for it. I have not examined it yet. What is the use? Why, if we presented to you a bill in exact accordance with what you believe, you would not dare to even vote for it. You set aside your manhood in the interest of trying to carry the country next November. Why, if Mr. UNDERWOOD says it is all right, his fellows on the Committee on Ways and Means say it is all right, and anything that the majority of the Ways and Means agree to you accept without thinking, without study. If it is true that a man formerly said that Congress was too lazy and too indolent and too ignorant to prepare a tariff bill, he must have been a prophet, and must have foreseen some of the performances that have occurred in our presence right here in this House of Representatives. [Laughter.] Why, if he said it about this Congress none of you would dare to go into court and sue him for libel. You would not dare to.

What have you done? What do you know about this cotton bill that is pending now? What do some of the new members of the committee know about it? I appeal to my genial friend from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], and ask him to tell if he knows anything about it. I yield him time now.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have no pearls to cast.

Mr. PAYNE. I thought that is all he knew about it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARTLETT). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado rose.

Mr. PAYNE. I except my genial friend from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], who has studied these questions and, having studied them, voted against these bills. I wish there were more like him over there. I do not know that I ought to tell the admissions I have heard in private conversations I have had with some of these gentlemen, and yet they did not tell them to me privately.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. PAYNE. With pleasure.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to say, in courtesy to the gentleman, that I do not follow him all along the line. I often find the gentleman is right, and I often find my associates on this side are wrong. I am trying to keep in the middle of the road. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I wish there were other gentlemen over there who were inclined also to keep in the middle of the road and were not inclined to get away up on one side, close against the rail fence, in order to file in and out after their leader on these questions. Gentlemen, wake up and study up on these propositions. Study them. I will help you if I can. I will help you to form a good tariff bill.

Why, some gentlemen on the Committee on Ways and Means have said to me that if I had offered that minority wool bill as a substitute for the wool schedule on the original Payne tariff bill there would not be any Democratic majority in this House to-day. I do not think there would be.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is a fact.

Mr. PAYNE. And I am in favor now of taking it up schedule by schedule, in accordance with the facts. I want the facts to appear in all of these schedules. I want to review the present tariff law and the facts as they appear on all these schedules. I am in favor of the fullest inquiry. Turn on the light. We tried to get it in 1909. Do not close the doors now.

Have you any criticism to make on the personnel of this Tariff Board? I have not heard any. Do you know the Democrats there? Of course, many of you know Mr. Howard. Mr. Page is an equally good man, coming from old Virginia. Talk with them. Go down and visit them and try to learn something. I wish to heaven you could go down and talk a few minutes with them before you take your vote on this paragraph; not simply to talk on the question of this appropriation, but to get a little general idea of what that board has been doing and the information which it has gotten together, and then you would be incited to hunt up that information; and then if you are going to put in a tariff bill for revenue only, you would not put prohibitory duties on the least expensive goods for "the poor people," whom you talk so much about, you know.

No; you would not put it on their goods. You would put a heavier duty, that was a protective duty, on the high grades of manufacture that the common people could not buy, that only the rich could buy. You would not reverse it, as you have in many of these "Underwood bills," and as you have in the bills that have come over from the Senate. Oh, study it. Go into a kindergarten on this business and learn it from the first principles. When you get strong enough, take up the reports of this Tariff Board and study those, and you may finally bring in a bill that will meet the approval of the American people when they come to understand it.

But you say the people are with you; that they are for a revision of the tariff. Well, go ahead. Possibly sometime you may make some of these bills into laws. You will not go much further after that. The empty dinner pail, the soup house, and all that business will come around. Things will be cheaper, perhaps, not according to the measure of wage, but according to the measure of money. Perhaps they will. I do not know. Do you know that nearly every item on which we put a lower rate of duty or which we put on the free list in that bill—and there were hundreds of them—costs just as much to the consumer to-day as it did before the cut was made in the duty? Somebody else is collecting that revenue and not the Government. The wholesaler, the retailer, the middleman are doing it. If you ever get your bills through they may do it for you. If they do, the condemnation and wrath of the American people may be postponed for a little while, but it is sure to come. Study these bills and lay up information against the day of wrath. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the adoption of the pending amendment. The positions of the two political parties with respect to taxation are historic and fundamental. In view of the radical difference of tariff views and of party methods of writing our tax laws, it is utterly immaterial whether we create and have in existence one tariff commission or board, or a dozen tariff commissions or none. After all is said and done by those commissions, the two political parties come together in Congress and insist on writing the tariff laws upon the basis suggested by their respective party views.

During last summer I delivered some remarks on this floor in the course of which I gave a history of tariff board or tariff commission agitation, both here and abroad, and in the course of this review I submitted and proved by the utterances and the actions of the leaders of the Republican Party for more than 30 years, not only their views with respect to a tariff board or a tariff commission and its functions and possible efficiency, but also the policy of their party with respect to the utilization of a tariff commission in dealing with the tariff.

The whole truth is, Mr. Chairman, that the Democratic Party, dealing with the tariff as it undertakes to deal with it from a revenue standpoint, has never needed a tariff board or tariff commission, and the Republican Party, dealing with the tariff from a protection view, has never wanted a tariff board or tariff commission except on two occasions, and those were occasions during which this party found itself and our present system of high protection confronted with a serious political crisis, which hazarded the existence of both.

In 1882 our Republican friends presented a proposition for a tariff commission. At that time, as now, the Democrats charged that it was an act of bad faith, that it was intended solely for the purpose of postponing and delaying honest tariff revision. The result was that they created that commission. It made its report, as the present Tariff Board has made its report. That report was not read by Congress. It was brushed aside. The Republican Congress later went through the pretense of revising the tariff, with the result that while the board had recommended a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent, the revision showed an actual increase on an average from 42 per cent to 47 per cent.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that I observe there are only 13 Republicans in their seats to hear this speech.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado for a question.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Would not the gentleman like more than 13 Republicans to hear his speech?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought not to say 13. That is an unlucky number.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman from Illinois makes 14. I will call attention to the fact that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Pending the count,

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention in a few words to the past action of our friends on the other side with respect to a tariff commission. After this commission had been characterized by Republicans as a failure in 1882, and by Democrats as a fraud, and after its work had been deliberately ignored even by our Republican friends, some years following they were in power at both ends of the Capitol, and they were revising the tariff by the McKinley bill. At or just prior to this time it was proposed by a Republican to have a tariff commission. Our Republican friends at both ends of the Capitol ignored the suggestion of a tariff commission and characterized it as useless, inefficient, and unnecessary.

In 1897, when the Dingley bill was pending, a suggestion was made by one Republican that a tariff commission should be created for the purpose of revising the tariff. The Speaker of the House and the leaders and the membership of the House on that side peremptorily refused even to consider the idea of reenacting a tariff board or a tariff commission law. It was brushed aside, and from that time, as well as before, all the leaders of the Republican Party in both Houses of Congress, and the Chief Executive at times, set forth the contention that a tariff board or commission was absolutely unnecessary; that whichever party might be in power would revise the tariff according to its respective views, and this position has been held until, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated, the Republicans found the country in open revolt against their tariff revision of 1909, and then they suddenly espoused a little propaganda that had been commenced in 1907 by the National Association of Manufacturers, who, anticipating another revision of the tariff, had undertaken to secure the adoption or the enactment of a tariff-commission law in the hope that they might through this agency maintain the existing system of protection.

In 1908 they urged the Republican national convention to insert a provision in its platform calling for the enactment of a tariff-commission law. The committee on resolutions ignored it and characterized it as useless if not frivolous. It was not until 1909 and 1910, after this storm had arisen against the operation and the effects of the Payne law, that this sudden, and I might say deathbed, conversion has overtaken the gentlemen on the other side, who now seemingly espouse with so much earnestness a tariff board or a tariff commission.

I said last summer, and I repeat it now, that in view of 30 years' record of that party, in view of the uniform utterances of all of its leaders, both in and out of Congress, this present pretended support of the tariff board or commission is nothing more than a downright deception on the part of gentlemen on the other side. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I agree, Mr. Chairman, that they are in earnest in the ultimate purpose which they are undertaking to subserve, and that is the maintenance inviolate of the existing system of high protective-tariff taxation with its long train of evils, and they may construe this act that I call deception merely as strategy by which they would mislead the people of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side of the House are finding great satisfaction and amusement in quoting extracts from speeches years ago by prominent Republicans opposing a tariff board. I am disposed to admit that until recent years a tariff board has been opposed by the dominant opinion in the Republican Party. But the Republican Party is not characterized by a narrow, bigoted adherence to opinion, and in that it differs from the Democratic Party, which, like the Bourbons, learns nothing and forgets nothing.

But where facts are brought to our attention, which properly ought to change our minds, we are ready to change; and I am ready to admit that the Republican Party, under the leadership and urgency of President Taft, has changed its opinion upon the Tariff Board and that it is now generally favorable to it, and for several years has advocated it.

I was pleased to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] openly admit that the bill for a permanent tariff commission was defeated under his leadership by the Democratic Party. When the project was first seriously urged by President Taft a majority of both parties seemed to favor it, but the Democratic fondness for it seemed to diminish as ours increased, and at last by filibustering they killed it. I personally have for some years been in favor of a tariff board, thinking we could not have too much light on these intricate and difficult problems and that they ought to be studied in the open. How different that is from the position which the Democratic Party has taken in this Congress in their tariff bills. The Republicans, when we were in a majority and framing a tariff law, not having any tariff board to furnish facts, always gave extensive hearings open to all parties interested, and so attempted to base the law upon ascertained facts. The Democratic Party in this Congress, having at their disposal the exhaustive investigations of the Tariff Board, disdainfully refuse to make use of them, deny all requests for hearings, and apparently prefer to evolve a bill from their inner consciousness quite unhampered by any unconfutable facts or knowledge. They prefer to act secretly and in the dark.

On the most far-reaching and radical of all their bills I understand the Committee on Ways and Means, having framed and agreed upon a bill, kept its provisions absolutely secret, so that when it was brought into the Democratic caucus the members of their own party knew nothing at all as to what its provisions were, so carefully had the secret been guarded. Then, in the caucus when the bill was sprung, the Democrats were all converted to it, and in a few hours all constitutional objections and details of the bill were explained, and satisfactorily, their minds were made up, and it came out with the sanction of the Democratic caucus, notwithstanding the fact that a few hours before the great majority of the party had not an inkling as to what the measure contained.

That is a sample of Democratic legislation, and that being their method, it is not strange that they are opposed to a tariff board, it is not strange that they do not want any light. It is not legislation by a party or by investigation, it is legislation by a few leaders and a mass of blind followers. One objection I always felt to a tariff board was that I did not believe any bipartisan board could investigate facts and come to a unanimous opinion. I believed the facts and the deductions from the facts were so intricately and inextricably involved that the members could never agree, and that there would be necessarily a partisan report on each side. I think it is a strong proof of the ability and fairness and mental integrity of the members of this Tariff Board that their reports have come in unanimous. It is a result which I did not believe possible, and to my mind it is a monument to the extraordinary soundness and thoroughness and ability of the present Tariff Board. Therefore, to my mind our experience thus far fully justifies the experiment that we have made. That board has been infinitely more successful than I supposed was possible. They have thrown light on the questions they have investigated, and to my mind they have opened a new era in the development of tariff bills. I believe we should have a permanent expert commission formed of men of such great ability as these gentlemen have proved themselves, in order that Congress may have the facts upon which tariff bills shall be framed. I am glad that it is the Republican Party that stands for it. I was glad to hear to-day the admissions that it was the Democratic Party that had tried to prevent it, and I believe that is bound to be the method of framing tariff bills in the future.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be closed in 30 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to say this to the gentleman, that this is a very important matter and there is politics in it; and a number of us not being members of the Ways and Means Committee who have to vote upon it and are to be held responsible for it at home want a little opportunity to say something as well as those gentlemen who happen to be members of that committee. Time has been extended liberally, and I think it ought to be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am simply endeavoring to ascertain what is wanted. If I can ascertain what gentlemen still desire to speak and about how much time they desire, then I shall ask that debate be closed at the end of that time.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to have 5 or 10 minutes myself—say, 10 minutes—but I shall not use it all if I can help.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time is desired on the other side?

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, so far as I know, no one on this side of the House desires to speak further, except the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] for five minutes, and I would like about five minutes when the discussion is through.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 10 or 15 minutes if it is entirely convenient, inasmuch as my name has been brought into the discussion.

Mr. MALBY. That will be convenient to me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment close at 3 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman, instead of making a motion in that way, would fix a certain time, because it always leaves everything in a mixed-up condition where we fix a definite time in that way. I suggest that the gentleman move to fix it in so many minutes—40 minutes, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have been discussing this particular amendment since half past 11. If we stop about 3 o'clock, that is as reasonable as anybody could wish. Mr. Chairman, I will make it 50 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is moved that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 50 minutes.

Mr. MALBY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York how much time he will want on his side of the House?

Mr. MANN. Oh, about half and half.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are three gentlemen on this side who indicate a desire to speak——

Mr. MANN. If there are 10 gentlemen they can have five minutes each.

Mr. MALBY. The gentleman from Connecticut says that he wants 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. HILL. I would ask the gentleman from New York if he includes the request which I made for some time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HILL. Fifteen minutes, if it is agreeable.

Mr. MANN. Make the request to close in 50 minutes, the gentleman from Connecticut to have 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not do that, because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, wants 15 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not couple with the gentleman's request that the gentleman from Connecticut have 15 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois have 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection; I presume the time would be divided between the two sides.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in one hour.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest in that connection the gentleman ask that the gentleman from Connecticut be given 15 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. That will give half an hour for other gentlemen.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed on this amendment and all amendments thereto in one hour, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] have 15 minutes and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] have 15 minutes of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in one hour, and of that time the gentleman from Connecticut may have 15 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois have 15 minutes, and the remainder of the time to be disposed of under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] No objection being heard, the request is granted. The gentleman from Illinois. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the address of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], who has just taken his seat, and to his criticism of Democratic methods of revising the tariff. He charges with evident sincerity that the majority in the present session of this Congress have proceeded to revise the tariff without information, that they have closed the windows through which light might come, and that they have preferred to proceed in the darkness. The speeches which have been made on this side, the reports submitted by the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee demonstrate the fact that the statement made by the gentleman in that particular is not in accordance with the facts. He comes from a State where they believe in the doctrine of protection. Now, the Republican method of revising the tariff is exceedingly easy; the method adopted by them when they produced the tariff law which has just been overwhelmingly repudiated by the people at the polls. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They simply examine interested witnesses, those witnesses who reap a profit by the imposition of high protective duties. They obtain information from no other source and then when they are in doubt as to what rate of protection a schedule ought to carry, they just raise it, that is all. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That method will meet with the approval of the protected industries of the country, and the protected industries furnish the sinews of war for the Republican Party in national elections.

I have no sympathy with the criticisms of the methods of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], my colleague, who for four terms presided over the deliberations of this House. He was simply, in the administration of his office, what the Republican majority of this House permitted him to be and wanted him to be. After he had bestowed upon his fellow Republicans all sorts of honors and after the people were led to repudiate the Republican Party, they turned from him and said, Why, the thing this country needs is to put somebody else in as Speaker of the House of Representatives. He furnished a splendid opportunity for insurgents and near insurgents to come back to Congress by pretending to be insurgents when they were simply insurgents upon the question of Cannonism. I have no sympathy with that sort of thing which found an echo here this afternoon in this debate. It was possible during the eight years of his incumbency of that office any day to depose him and put somebody else in. They had the majority to do it, and they declined to do it. Cannonism was and is Republicanism. He furnished the Republican Party with the only leader they have had for a decade, and as soon as he was deposed they commenced to try to get along without a leader. Why, even here in this House you are doing that at the present time, drifting along without leadership; you are on a rudderless sort of cruise at the present time over troubled seas [applause on the Democatic side], not guided even by the stars. To-day, in the City by the Lakes, disorganized, broken, beaten, and discouraged, the remnants of the Republican Party are assembling for the purpose of holding another national convention. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Here in the House no Republican seriously thinks of following the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], my colleague, who has been selected as the nominal leader on your side. He does not seem to care whether you follow him or not; if he has ever developed a policy no one knows what it is. He never leads or tries to lead, and you never follow or try to follow. I get the impression often that here on the floor the Republican leader starts to lead without knowing himself which way he intends to go.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. But the ascendancy of the Democracy is rising in the same proportion.

Mr. RAINEY. I think the gentleman is right about it; and I want to say for the gentleman from Colorado, who has been charged this afternoon with being a Republican by the nominal leader on the Republican side, and no more serious charge in these days of repeated Democratic victories can be made against a Democrat than to say that he shows Republican tendencies—I want to say for this old ex-Confederate soldier, who represents here a Colorado constituency and who sits on this side of the House, who recently in this Capital City assembled all the ex-Confederates who hold high office, and with no decorations in his banquet room except the Stars and Stripes, held a reunion, that he never has during the time he has been a Member of this House bolted a Democratic caucus. There have been times when he has not voted with the majority here—once or twice, perhaps—but he never voted against a majority of his colleagues without having first obtained their permission in caucus assembled. We have a rule which the Republican Members may not have—a Democratic rule—which provides that if a Democratic Member of Congress prior to his election has made promises and speeches to his constituents along certain lines he is not bound by caucus action if he asks permission of the caucus not to be bound. The gentleman from Colorado is a splendid gentleman of the old school, a vigorous enemy of Republican practices and tendencies, and a most valuable addition to the Democratic side of this House.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. HULL. I just want to say in that connection that I agree with the gentleman, and I intended to make a similar statement when I had the floor, but I was interrupted and did not have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. RAINEY. At the present time we are told by Republican Members of Congress, speaking upon this proposition, that Republicans are united, and it appears that you are. Of course you are united on this proposition. You are united on this proposition because you are Republicans, and you can always get Republicans to unite on any proposition that takes away from the people power and confers it upon the Executive. You were able for eight years to agree upon a similar proposition when you conferred all the power of this House upon the Speaker of the House of Representatives. We are told that the way to revise the tariff scientifically is to find out the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad and then perhaps deduct ocean-freight charges, and then by some sort of mysterious alchemy you contend we will have a measure that is fixed and unchangeable for revising tariff schedules. The fact is that men of the same race the world around, living along the same parallels of latitude, are working in about the same climatic conditions, in about the same kind of factories, and producing about the same sort of output and about the same amount per man. If they are of different races living in the same latitude they are producing different articles, and those articles do not compete with each other. It is impossible to arrange any definite standard as to what it costs to raise a bushel of wheat on farms in the same locality. A fertile farm here under proper management may produce twice as much as an unfertile farm in the same locality where the management is not quite so good. It is impossible to adopt any definite measure by which tariffs can be revised. The report of the Tariff Commission on the paper and pulp schedule shows that it costs varying amounts of money to produce paper in certain mills in the United States. In certain mills where efficient methods are observed it costs less than in other and poorer mills, and the same rule prevails with reference to all industries.

Now, what is to be the measure of difference? If you attempt to average the differences in cost of production per unit here and abroad and then levy tariffs in accordance with that, you will levy tariffs not needed by the most efficient mills and you will not levy as much as the mills of lowest efficiency need. The only measure, if you adopt that measure at all, by which you can satisfy manufacturers in this country is to equalize duties in accordance with the capacity of those mills which in the most expensive way produce the most expensive unit of quantity. It is impossible to do it in any other way. And so that brings us back to the only possible rule that can logically be adopted in this decade, when the people of the country are rebelling against extravagant protective tariffs—the only rule that can possibly be logically adopted is the rule which levies tariffs for revenue purposes only, a method of tariff taxation in which Democrats the country over believe.

We are told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], whose tariff bill has been so overwhelmingly repudiated, that we ought to turn in the light on the question, and he makes the generous proposition to us that if we want his assistance in revising the tariff we are welcome to it. The bills reported out by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee and passed through this House by Democratic votes have been popular measures, and they have been popular measures because they have not met with the approval of the gentleman from New York. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We will be able to continue our tariff program without the assistance of the man or the men who framed the bill which has brought to the Democrats in this House a majority of over 70. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The idea that it is possible to arrive at the difference in the cost of producing an article abroad and here, and then use that as a method of impartial tariff revision appeals to those who have not studied the subject as possessing a measure of fairness. It proceeds always upon the theory that it costs more to produce an article in this country than to produce it abroad. The cotton report recently submitted by the President's Tariff Commission, if it is of any value at all, shows that we produce cotton goods in this country at the same cost or at less cost than the same goods are produced in England. Under these circumstances what would be the measure of tariff protection?

It costs in England and it costs here different amounts per unit of production in different factories. Are we to take as the measure of difference the lowest cost per unit of production in England and the lowest cost per unit of production here? In other words, shall we arrive at the cost difference by finding out what it costs in the best factories in England to produce an article and finding out what it costs in the best factories in the United States to produce the same article? We will probably find not much difference in cost if we adopt this standard. Sometimes the difference in cost will be greater here and sometimes it will be greater in England. Or shall we adopt the method of finding the cost difference between the products of the least efficient factories of England and the least efficient factories here? Or shall we try to average the cost of production here and abroad? If we do that, we invariably have a tariff not needed by the best factories for protection and not high enough to protect the least efficient factories.

If we adopt either of these illogical methods of revising the tariff the effect is simply to put a premium upon the inefficient factories and to enable the best factories to distribute dividends larger than ever on their watered stock. The logical result of the Republican position carried into effect will be this, that tariff protection will be regulated always by the cost of the most expensive unit.

Not long ago the President of the United States, in his Winona speech, pronounced schedule K, the woolen schedule, indefensible. We took him at his word, and revised that schedule first of all. It went to him with slight increases put upon it by the Senate. He vetoed the bill, not because the Senate had increased the rates fixed by the House, but he vetoed it because his Tariff Board had not reported. Slowly the months passed. Finally his Tariff Board reported. We sent back to him the same bill. It is in the Senate now on its way to the President. The President preferred to be responsible for 12 months' delay in revising this schedule in order to get the opinion of five men, which he valued more highly than the action of the 391 Members of Congress elected to represent in the lower House the various States of the Union, and he valued their opinion more highly than the conclusion reached by the Senate of the United States. The effect of the delay in waiting for the report of the Tariff Board is merely this: The people of the country on account of this 12 months' delay have paid $50,000,000 more for clothes than they would have paid if we had not had this Tariff Board and if the bill had been signed by the President when it came to him from the Congress.

The time will never come when taxes will not be an interesting subject in this Republic. The admitted object of selecting a Tariff Board is to take away from the representatives of the people the power to control the levying of taxes. Of course this is a purely Republican theory.

The Republican Party, after building high a tariff wall around the country, after firmly establishing a system of taxation which gives to protected industries the right to collect taxes, which compels the consumers of the country to pay taxes which never reach the Treasury, after having been overwhelmingly repudiated on account of broken tariff promises by the people at the polls, seeing ahead still greater and more disastrous defeat, ask now for a simple and easy way to carry through the future years the system which has been repudiated by the people, the system against which the people are rebelling, the system of establishing and maintaining high tariffs for the purpose of protecting the profits of manufacturers. The way they propose to accomplish this result is to adopt the tariff-board theory, a method which will make it possible for five men, or more than that, or perhaps less, not responsible at all to the people, but only to the Executive, selected by the Executive, to relieve Congress of the burden and the responsibility of revising the tariff. The Democratic policy is that Representatives of the people, responsible to the people, in a referendum vote held every two years, ought to originate revenue measures. If Republican theories and tendencies are to prevail in this country, it will not be long until Congress will be relieved of all its functions except the distribution of farmers' bulletins and vegetable seed.

We believe that the Ways and Means Committee of the House, responsible for tariff bills, should have ample assistance—the assistance of experts, to be selected by it and to be responsible to it and not to the Executive—we believe in the method which we have so far followed in this Congress in the bills passed through the House and on to the Senate—the method which is meeting with the approval of the people of the country—the method which we propose as Democrats to continue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we read in Holy Writ of those who love darkness rather than light, because their works are evil——

Mr. SIMS. Deeds.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; deeds. I stand corrected by a better Bible student, the gentleman from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

The Democratic Party has placed itself in this evil category in the matter now pending before the committee, for of all of the sources of light—clear, expansive, illuminating—that the country has ever known, the reports of the Tariff Board exceed them all. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But what is information, what is light, to a Democratic House in the matter of tariff except to confuse, except to annoy, except to prove the worthlessness and the indefensible character of their basic principles? I was going to say—they are not worthy of that name—their doctrine, touching the tariff. The idea that in a great country, with a standard of living far above that of any other nation on earth, with a rate of wages higher than that of any other people, and constantly increasing—the idea that in such a nation you can in all things compete with the underpaid, the miserably depressed, the hunger-driven labor of all the world, is not entitled to serious consideration by intelligent men. And yet, as I understand it, that is the theory of the gentlemen on the other side.

As against such a theory and in repudiation of such a theory we seek light and facts, the facts of the cost of production, and we have discovered that those facts can be obtained. They can be obtained so that they appeal to all thinking and reasoning men, and we are in favor of continuing the agency through which they have been and can be obtained.

Time was when, free from combinations in this country, with free competition in all lines, it was not material if a tariff rate was somewhat higher than the measure of the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. But in these later days the people have demanded that we should bring the tariff rates down to the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and in order to do that intelligently we must have information. We all know that there is no Member of this House who has sufficient knowledge and information upon which to base a complete tariff schedule. We all know that it is impossible to secure too much information. We all know that information can be obtained from this source—the Tariff Board—and inasmuch as we desire to reduce the rates as low as they can be safely reduced without subjecting our people to the ruinous competition of underpaid labor elsewhere, we desire the continuation of the Tariff Board, while our Democratic friends insist that this flood of light shall no longer be shed upon this all-important subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry I have no time left.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am going to extend the gentleman's time.

Mr. MONDELL. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming be extended three or five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not want that to be taken out of my time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I do not want it taken out of my time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, before the gentleman from Indiana begins, that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], proceeding as he does, is just like a trotting horse. The gentleman and I have been in the same business, breeding and racing horses. We know the peculiarities of a trotting horse. Sometimes it gets such a speed that it goes into a wall and butts its brains out; but here the relation must stop, because the gentleman from Wyoming has too much brains to be spent that way. But the gentleman, without intention, has said something here that is very interesting, to the effect that the Republican Party is pledged to a protection in degree governed with reference to the difference in the cost of production abroad and here. I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I have never adopted that doctrine. That really goes further than I can go, because I do not believe that such a measure should be placed upon our production. The gentleman is standing by the old Republican doctrine; the Progressive Republicans are going beyond that; and I, as a Progressive Democrat, am going beyond the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman from Colorado for extending my time in order that he might make a speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, in 1909, at the time when it was proposed to establish a tariff board, I was opposed to the proposition, and the Democrats were assured by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that there would be no tariff board, and every stand-pat Republican upon that side of the Chamber was opposing the establishment of a tariff board.

It was not until 1911, after they had been defeated because of the passage of the Payne bill, that they became converts to the establishment of a Tariff Board, and then it was only done for the purpose of extending the opportunities for the tariff barons to exploit the pockets of the ultimate consumers of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] At the present rate at which the reports of this Tariff Board are being made it would take 28 years to revise the tariff. It is procrastinating and thereby delaying relief from a revision downward of the tariff. The Democratic Party has always taken the position that there was no need of a tariff board in order to levy a tariff for revenue in this country. Last year the manufacturers of this country turned out $16,000,000,000 worth of finished products at a labor cost of $3,250,000,000, a labor cost of about 21 per cent. Yet the Payne-Aldrich bill now in force levies an average duty of 47 per cent—more than double the labor cost of production.

The Democratic Party knew and the people of this country know that it requires no Tariff Board to show them that the tariff levied under that bill was unjust and unfair to the American people; that its duties are excessive and greatly exceed any difference in cost of production at home and abroad. I want to call attention now to the report of the Tariff Board on the cotton schedule, which conclusively shows our contention is correct. This is the bill about which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] on yesterday lamented over its introduction at this time. If you will read the report of the Tariff Board, as found on pages 13 and 14, you will find that, taking the measure of protection fixed by the Republican Party in their national platform of 1908, to equal the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit, it needs no tariff. If the report can be relied on as correct in its statements, then our Republican friends have no room to complain. We are producing cotton goods in this country cheaper than any country in the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to some extracts from that report:

> Figures are presented in the report showing that although the labor costs in the cotton industry are in many cases lower in the United States than in England, yet the actual hourly earnings in this country are, in most of the principal occupations, much greater.

They labor more hours and for less money under the Payne-Aldrich bill. And to-day we have an anomaly presented. One of the leading candidates of the Republican Party for President is advocating that there be written in the tariff bill as a law the provision that labor shall have the tariff that is levied. He confesses, as we have always contended, that labor has not been receiving the tariff as the Republicans have claimed in order to secure the votes of the laborers in this country. This claim contradicts all claims heretofore made on this subject.

It is an admission that his party has been deceiving the laboring man. Yet this candidate is the man for whom the stand-pat Republicans are to-day preparing the old steam roller which it is to roll over him at the coming Chicago convention. He is advocating the doctrine that labor has not been getting the tariff, as everyone knows, but that the owners of the industries have been receiving that part of the tariff as unearned profits. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I call attention to another paragraph on this page of the report:

The conclusion that under present methods of production on many plain fabrics the cost of production is not greater in this country is also borne out by a comparison of English and American mill prices. A comparison of such prices on a large variety of these fabrics in England and the United States for the date of July 1, 1911, shows that in the case of plain goods the American prices at the mill was in no case much above the English mill price, while in the majority of cases it was lower. It should be noted, however, that American prices of this date relative to the price of cotton were somewhat lower than normal. The English prices are the regular quotations for the home market, and are not necessarily the prices for export and for neutral markets. In the case of fancy goods, however, where the looms tended are necessarily less, the American mill prices were in most cases higher than the English.

The subject of prices is referred to below, but the fact that in the case of a number of leading fabrics the American manufacturer is selling at less than is the English manufacturer is corroborative of the statement that plain goods can be manufactured as cheaply in this country as in England. The report also gives information as to the ability of the American manufacturer to compete in neutral markets on goods of this kind.

Yet the effort of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] yesterday as a calamity howler was to make it appear in the face of this report that if this Democratic legislation, the cotton bill, was enacted into law it would shut down the industries of this country because of the want of an adequate amount of protection. I quote again from the same report:

A comparison of 60 specific samples for which finishing data were obtained shows that in most cases the differences between the charges in the two countries were slight, but that the American charges were slightly lower on most of the samples.

DUTIES IN RELATION TO COSTS OF WEAVING AND FINISHING.

The report includes a table of 48 selected plain goods on which the English mill prices and the American mill prices correspond very closely. It shows that in a majority of cases the American prices are somewhat lower than the English. On these goods the present duty varies from half the total American cost of conversion to more than twice such cost. The high figure, however, applies to only two samples. In nearly all cases the duty is more than 80 per cent of the total American cost of conversion, and in a majority of cases it more than equals the entire conversion cost in this country.

* * * * * * *

These figures show a large number of costs in which the duty per square yard on the cloth unfinished (in the grey) is more than equal to the total conversion cost. To take an extreme case, in the case of a plain heavy duck, the present duty is 8 cents per square yard, which is more than six times the total conversion cost, although only 38 per cent ad valorem on the foreign market value. The variations are very great, running from this extreme of six times the conversion cost to duties which are less than half of the conversion cost. The ratio of the duty to the conversion cost bears little relation to the ratio of the duty to the foreign market value. Thus, in some cases, duties which are less than 30 per cent ad valorem will be one and a half times the total American conversion cost, while in other cases duties of nearly 50 per cent ad valorem will be only three-fourths of the American conversion costs. In the greater number of cases the duties are greater than the total domestic cost of spinning and weaving.

* * * * * * *

In the majority of cases, so far as the actual samples are concerned, for which cost figures were secured, the increase in duty is in excess of the total actual increase in cost, due to the finishing processes. On the samples used the extra duty for bleaching ranges from half the total cost of bleaching to three times this cost. The extra duty for printing is from one-third the cost of printing to one and two-thirds the cost. In the case of dyeing quite similar conditions prevail. The additional duty for mercerizing in the case of these samples was from 40 per cent in excess of the cost of mercerizing to double the cost.

That the duty itself is double the labor cost in the production of the article.

The higher figure, however, applies to only two samples. In nearly all the cases the duty is more than 80 per cent of the total American cost of conversion, and in the majority of cases it more than equalizes the entire conversion cost in this country.

Now, that report clearly discloses the fact that to-day the duty is more than twice the labor cost of the article in this country. A tariff board could not levy a scientific tariff until men in business ability are made equal and all localities for production are similarly situated and equally located to the markets of the world. A tariff board can not make that condition. It is beyond its power to do so.

Now, I want to call attention to some of the articles upon which duties were levied in the metal schedule recently passed by this House, and show that in each case the duties are in every paragraph in excess of the labor cost of the production of the article.

Take cutlery, one of the most expensive in labor of all articles produced. Last year in labor cost there was paid in wages $7,000,000. The amount of production was $18,000,000. The labor cost was 38 per cent, and the average duty is 31¼ per cent. If the foreign labor cost of production was only one-half of what it is in America there would be sufficient to meet that difference and leave about 15 per cent as a net profit.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. I have only a short time.

Mr. CANNON. It is only a short question, and I will get the gentleman one minute more time.

Mr. CULLOP. Very well; please state it.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman get his facts touching the cotton report from the report of the Tariff Board?

Mr. CULLOP. I am reading from the first volume of the Tariff Commission's report on cotton manufactures, on pages 13 and 14, as made recently by the present Tariff Board.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman believes that that report is correct?

Mr. CULLOP. I assume that it is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Then why not have more of it?

Mr. CULLOP. I will tell the gentleman why we do not want any more of it. Because it is a useless expenditure of public money to furnish information on what every intelligent man in the country knows or ought to know. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I may say in addition that I am reading it as a confession of the Republican Party of its erroneous position on this great question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the limited time I have remaining I want to call attention to as many of the articles as I have the time, to show that none of them was reduced to such an extent as will produce the result claimed by the calamity howlers on the Republican side of this House. Their fears are unfounded; if they will examine the facts and lay aside their blind adoration for the unjust and unfair system to which they stand pledged for the benefit of the big campaign contributor, and which plunders the ultimate consumers of the country; they will concede their position is absolutely untenable. In the new bill just passed take, for instance, cutlery, which I was considering when interrupted by the gentleman from Illinois.

According to the census reports on manufacturing we produced last year in round numbers $18,000,000 worth, and paid for the labor which produced it $7,000,000. The labor cost was 38 per cent, the average duty was made 31¼ per cent. Now, if the foreign labor cost was only one-half of what it is in this country, which no one will claim, it would equal 19 per cent, then the duty would cover the difference in labor cost and 11¼ per cent for profit, which all must confess to be a reasonable one.

Again, take files: We produced $4,390,000 worth. There was paid for the labor in their production $1,500,000, so that the labor cost was 34½ per cent. The duty is fixed at 25 per cent. If the foreign labor cost in their manufacture is one-half of what it is in America, which we do not concede, it would be 17 per cent. The duty then is 8 per cent more than the difference in the cost of labor production at home and abroad.

Again, take screws: We produced over $2,000,000 worth last year. There was paid for the labor in their production $500,000. The labor cost equaled 25 per cent and the duty is fixed at 25 per cent. If the foreign labor cost is only one-half of what it is in this country, a thing we do not concede, it leaves 12½ per cent profit in duty to the manufacturer of this article.

Again, take firearms: We produced last year $8,075,000 worth. We paid in wages for their production $3,722,000. The labor cost equaled 45 per cent. In this item the labor cost is probably higher than in any other of our manufactures. The duty is fixed at 35 per cent. If it only cost one-half in foreign countries to produce these articles that it costs in this country, then the labor cost there would be 22½ per cent, a thing we deny, but it would leave a profit to the manufacturer over and above the difference in labor cost of production at home and abroad of 12½ per cent.

Again, take watches: The labor cost is fixed at 40 per cent. The duty is 30 per cent. If they can be produced in foreign countries for one-half of the labor cost entailed here, a fact which we deny, then the labor cost abroad would be 20 per cent. The duty in this item would pay the difference in labor cost at home and abroad and leave 10 per cent as a net profit to the manufacturer.

Again, take clocks. The labor cost is 40 per cent. If the labor cost of producing the same article abroad is one-half of what it is here, a thing we deny, then it would cost the foreigners to produce these same articles 20 per cent for labor. The duty is fixed at 30 per cent. This would pay the difference between the labor cost of production at home and abroad and leave an excess of 10 per cent.

Again, take tools. We produced last year $20,000,000 worth. We paid for wages in producing them $6,000,000, so the labor cost was 30 per cent. If they can be produced by foreigners by one-half of the labor cost here, a thing no one will claim, then the labor cost abroad would be 15 per cent. The duty is fixed at 25 per cent; this would pay the difference in cost of production at home and abroad and leave an excess of 10 per cent.

If I had the time, I could go on and take other items in the bills which the Democratic House has passed and show the same facts to exist relative to every other item contained in those bills. The duty has not only taken care of the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, but has left a large excess as a net unearned profit to the manufacturers. These duties were not fixed for the purpose of protection, but for revenue, because of the extravagance of the Republican Party in public expenditures; they are made necessary in order to raise revenue to meet these large expenditures.

This clearly demonstrates the fact that we do not need a Tariff Board to ascertain what duties should be levied, and therefore it is a useless expenditure of public moneys to maintain a board which can serve no good purpose to the country, but only to delay a proper revision of the tariff and give the trusts and combinations a longer period of time to exploit the pockets of the ultimate consumers of the country. For this reason I opposed the Tariff Board in 1909, and have done so every time it has been proposed from that time up to the present, and expect to continue to oppose it for the reasons herein given. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, there are two things that I greatly desire for my country. One is peace and the other is prosperity. I am in favor of peace by arbitration and not by force. For that reason I wish that we might have an army large enough for a national police at least, and a navy strong enough for the national defense, and I objected very seriously the other day when the Democratic Party attempted to cut down the Army by five regiments, and absolutely did cut out from the naval estimates two battleships.

I remember distinctly in 1898 when the solid Democratic Party sitting on that side of the House demanded that this country should go to war with Spain, and, backed up by a few Republicans, against the protest of the eminent gentleman from Illinois and others, they succeeded ultimately in doing it after the battleship Maine was blown up.

In my judgment conditions to-day are far more serious, and I do not want to see the Army of the United States and the Navy reduced in the face of such conditions as exist to-day with reference to both Cuba and Mexico.

I also want prosperity, and I am a believer in the doctrine of protection that has given prosperity to this country such as is unparalleled in the history of the world, but we have soon to go into a political campaign, gentlemen, faced by the danger of the protective system being destroyed by the Democratic Party if they secure control.

Now, as a proof of that, I want to give you the opinion on this subject of each candidate who will present his name for acceptance at the Baltimore convention.

Mr. Harmon says:

> The first step must be to redeem the tariff from its perverted use and restore it to its proper place as a revenue measure by gradual reductions so that all concerned may have time to prepare for the change.

I remember the change in 1894. I do not want to have to prepare for another change of that kind. It is not necessary to quote from Mr. UNDERWOOD, but I will. Said he:

> We on this side of the House do not believe that a tariff should be levied for purposes of protection.

Let me quote from the Speaker, a man who is always frank and honest and who is never afraid to express his opinions, a man who, in my judgment, is to lead the Democratic hosts in the next campaign. At the close of the Sixty-first Congress he said that he "was for a tariff for revenue only"—and that is a thing that I am against—and without any qualification he adds that—

> It means a tax on everything, having no free list, or a very small one, if any.

Gov. Wilson spoke the other night in New York, and, referring to the Republican platform of protection, he said:

> It is not too much to say that the whole proposition is ignorant and preposterous.

So far as I could judge from reading his speech twice, I am of the opinion that he would gladly wipe out all tariffs in this country at the earliest possible moment—tariffs either for revenue or protection. That is my judgment. The prosperity of this Nation has come through a wise application of the policy of protection, until the marvelous development of our industries has made lower rates possible. The clear, unmistakable call to a change of method, but not a change of policy, came to us in 1901, on September 5, when President McKinley said:

> We have a vast and intricate business, built up through years of toil and struggle, in which every part of the country has its stake, which will not permit of either neglect or undue selfishness. No narrow, sordid policy will subserve it. Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets requires our urgent and immediate attention. The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. If, perchance, some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue, or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to promote and extend our markets abroad?

I shall not follow down the history from that time to this, for I have not the time, but I want to call the attention of Republicans, as well as Democrats, to the platform of 1908, wherein it defines the true measure of protection which has been quoted so often and so effectively. What does it say besides that? It says:

> The aim and purpose of the Republican policy being not only to preserve without excessive duties the security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled, but also to maintain the high standard of living of the wage workers in this country, who are the most direct beneficiaries of the protective system.

I believe that it is the duty of the Republican Party and every Representative here, from time to time, if a tariff rate becomes exeessive, to vote to reduce it to the point of protection and not one particle below that, and I believe for that purpose that we ought to have a permanent, independent tariff board, whose business it shall be to study and collect the facts, as the European tariff boards do, and submit them to us. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I remember in 1909 there came a man before the Ways and Means Committee. He made egg beaters. He came from the northern part of the country and demanded a higher tariff on egg beaters. He was asked various questions—whether he was making money, and he said he was, and a lot of it; and whether he had any foreign trade, and he said he had, all over the world. Then he was asked whether there was a profit in his business, and he answered yes; but yet he demanded a higher tariff. I said to him in the presence of the committee, "For heaven's sake, what do you want a higher tariff for?" and he replied, with a brazen effrontery that I have never since forgotten, "Because I want to make more money."

I was ashamed of myself, I was ashamed of the man, and I want no possibility of such a thing as that being repeated. I stand here to-day to say that, in my judgment, the Democratic Party is making a mistake, making a mistake politically, making a mistake economically, when it stops the appropriations for the Tariff Board, nonpartisan, not a Republican tariff board, not a Democratic tariff board, not a tariff board hitched to a partisan committee as the tail of a Democratic kite, not a partisan board hitched to a Republican committee in the Senate as the tail of a Republican kite, but a tariff board made up of independent, nonpartisan men, with a certainty of permanent tenure of office, independent of political positions, honest in their convictions—yes, honest as protectionists, honest as free traders, honest as revenue-tariff men. I would trust any of them put in that position. I want to see such a board as that maintained. It has done wonderful work.

To his everlasting credit President Taft put two wide-awake Democrats on the board in cooperation with three Republicans at the close of the last session when the Democratic Party defeated the bill for a permanent tariff commission. So far as he could he made it permanent; so far as he could he made it nonpartisan. I believe that I owe it to William H. Taft as the present President of the United States, as the next nominee of the Republican Party, and the next President of the United States, in my judgment, to stand squarely behind him and put forward every effort in my power to secure an appropriation for a tariff board and the continuance of a nonpartisan examination of the basic facts of every industry. For one I am not content, when he sends in a message with a report from such a board, earnestly and officially recommending to Congress the immediate revision of the schedule upon which the report is made, to answer "What is the use?" I am not ready to make that reply.

Gentlemen, I am going home to my constituents this fall. I am going to make a campaign on an honest tariff, backed up by intelligent investigations, before any schedule is touched. I stand for the Payne bill, unless we have an intelligent investigation before it is amended. It is a good bill. It would have been better if it had become a law as it passed the House; but it is a good bill as it is. It has mistakes; but what legislation has not? But it made a reduction of 14.24 per cent of the tariff which would have been collected by the Dingley law had it continued in force. I know some of my friends think that is one of the worst features of it. I do not agree with them; but the country does approve the Payne bill, so far as the actual reductions are concerned. Now, I want to see that bill stand. It gave us the maximum and minimum tariff law. It gave us the Tariff Board; it gave us the Customs Court; it gave us the greatest reduction in the tariff that has ever been made in the history of this country by any one act of legislation, and I want to see it stand until it is amended schedule by schedule—every excessive rate cut out, all inequalities corrected—under the leadership for another four years of William Howard Taft, who signed it. That is the position I am taking. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am for a tariff board. Now, what is the alternative? The alternative is just simply this: You abolish the Tariff Board and you go back to the old system. I think, gentlemen, you are ashamed of the old system yourselves. You Democrats can take no credit to yourselves, for the last tariff you made was denounced by your own President as being branded with perfidy and dishonor, and, if I am not much mistaken, the cotton schedule which was last reported on was the ground on which that declaration was made. There are mistakes in the present one, mistakes which Chairman PAYNE corrected in the House, but which were put back in the Senate. I stand, therefore, in favor of its revision. You can not revise it too quickly for me. The facts shown by the Tariff Board report makes it plain that it should be corrected; and when that is done, whether we are under the leadership of William Howard Taft—as I believe we will be—or under the leadership of my genial friend from Missouri, CHAMP CLARK, who his political friends hope will be their leader [applause on the Democratic side], I want to see the responsibility for the basic facts in regard to tariff legislation put on an independent nonpartisan tariff board and the credit for appropriate legislation given to the dominant party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to hear the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], but difficult to follow him. But I feel that I ought to pause here long enough to state that in his selecting the present President of the United States for reelection he was applauded the first time by five Republicans and the last time by one out of the number of Republicans present.

Mr. HILL. That does not trouble me, I am planted on a rock. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Certainly, just like the Titanic is planted on a rock, 10,000 feet below the surface. I do not see why we should have all this row about a tariff board. We are not making or trying to make, because it is impossible under the present conditions, an ideal Democratic tariff. We have had high protection for 50 years and conditions have grown up under that high protection which we have to meet, and it is a question of judgment about how much of this high protection we shall take off, but the Democrats are all united that the tariff should be lower, and we are not so ignorant that we can not count the rails and see that a fence is 10 rails high, and we can certainly take 2 rails from that fence without having a scientific expert board to tell us whether it is 10 rails high or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me tell you what the position of an ideal protectionist is. He is a man who believes in a tariff on imports that absolutely prohibits the imports that compete with American manufactures. Now, that is true, and my friend from New York [Mr. MALBY] knows it is true, because it is not full protection unless it does.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman give way?

Mr. SIMS. I have only five minutes.

Mr. MALBY. I prefer to state in my own way my own opinion.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman would not be embarrassed I have no doubt he would. The gentleman knows that the bedrock protection argument is that we make a prohibitive tariff and let home industries keep down prices by competing with each other. What does the Democratic Party need with a tariff board? We do not believe in protection. We do not want any excuse for protection. An ideal revenue tariff is one levied only on articles not made or produced in this country, just as a Republican ideal tariff is one that is levied exclusively on articles made in this country. For revenue purposes we may not be able to get revenue enough by levying on noncompeting articles only, and therefore we have got to levy something on competing articles. Our purpose is to get revenue instead of profits to private individuals.

My friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] met one honest man, and he seems to have disgusted Mr. HILL when that man came before the committee and told him he wanted more protection because he wanted more money. That man was honest. That is what they all want it for. If he had told the gentleman from Connecticut that he wanted more tariff in order to give his laborers higher wages, the gentleman from Connecticut would have put on a smile and said, "You know that I am the friend of the laboring man." You have no use for a man who comes before the committee and says he wants to make more money as a reason for wanting higher tariff protection.

We are in a condition where we can not be ideal Democrats. Why? When a man has been drunk for six months you can not take all the liquor away from him at once, can you? We have had high protection dope for 50 years, and the country has got the protection jimjams, and we can not take it all away at once. That is the reason we can not pass ideal Democratic tariff bills at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SIMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 23626) to appropriate $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to equip all Army transports with all lifeboats and rafts necessary to accommodate every person for which transportation facilities are now provided on said transports, and the crew of said transports, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a tariff board, not because I believe it is going to be an infallible instrumentality of government, but because I believe it is going to be a very useful instrumentality. I would not agree to abdicate my judgment as a Representative to accept the judgment of any tariff board, but I believe there is no better way—and I have believed that for a long time—to collect the basic facts of industry, facts that are most important to be considered in framing a tariff bill, than by the instrumentality of a scientific commission.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has said, "What is this row all about?" I agree. I can not see any reason for division between the two sides of the House on the question at issue here. It is simply whether we are going to perpetuate an instrumentality for collecting facts which would be useful to the Democrats as well as to the Republicans. It is said that only two schedules have been investigated and reported upon—the woolen and the cotton schedules. Those are two very difficult schedules. They have both been reported upon and the work chiefly done within a year; and then, in addition to that, most of the important information—and I invite the gentlemen on the other side to say if I am not correct—most of the important information that the majority had use of in forming their chemical schedule was obtained from the Tariff Board.

The gentleman who had charge of the chemical bill before the House acknowledged the great obligations that he and his associates were under for the facts gathered and the work performed by the Tariff Board.

Now, this board has been called "a board of mere clerks." I do not believe that there is any body in the service of the Government that has any better membership than that. We all know that Prof. Emery was at the head of the department of economics in one of the greatest universities of the country—nominally, a Republican. We all know that Prof. Page was at the head of the department of economics of another great university—the University of Virginia—and nominally a Democrat; and if we were asked to pick out a Member of this House to serve upon the Tariff Board, I do not believe that we could pick out a man who would command the respect of his fellow Members more than was commanded by William M. Howard, Democrat, of Georgia. Then we had two other members of the board—one who knew especially about the conditions in agriculture, and the other who knew especially about the administration of our customs laws.

I believe that this House will make a great mistake if it shall vote not to continue the appropriation and to keep going the splendid piece of machinery that has been set up in the creation of this board.

A year ago, as has been said, the leading Members upon that side of the House were in favor of this organization. To-day the Republicans are generally in favor of it. You do not need to adopt the theory in regard to the cost of production in framing your tariff, because you can utilize the facts and apply them to any theory upon which you think tariff revision should proceed. And I think it would be a very great mistake if we should do away with this board and refuse to vote for the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore given my views respecting the character of this so-called Tariff Board, and explained the process by which it was pruned of all useful power and authority and made a servient tool to hinder, delay, and postpone the judgment of the people.

I am opposed to the appropriation asked for by this amendment for the reason that there is no existing law to support an appropriation for a tariff board, and no tariff board is authorized by the amendment offered.

The claim is made that section 2 of the act of August 5, 1909, commonly known as the Payne law, supplemented by the provisions of the appropriation acts of June 25, 1910, and March 4, 1911, creates a board to investigate the tariff and obtain reliable data to be used as the basis of tariff legislation.

Section 2 of the Payne law relates solely and exclusively to the maximum and minimum tariff rates, and provides for the enforcement of such rates by the President accordingly as foreign nations may be found to discriminate against our exports, and no power or authority is given the President for any other purpose.

There is not one word, line, or sentence to be found in all said section 2 which in any way pertains to any investigation of the tariff as a basis for legislation, or to authorize the President to employ any person to make any investigation or any examination for the purpose of obtaining tariff data to be used in tariff revision.

And while both the appropriation act of June 25, 1910, and the appropriation act of March 4, 1911, assume to grant power to investigate the tariff, yet by express limitation in both of these acts the power granted is made to relate only to the power of the President to employ persons to assist him in the discharge of his prescribed duties of securing information as to what nations, if any, are discriminating against the exports of the United States for the purpose of enforcing the maximum and minimum tariff rates, and not to secure information for use in tariff legislation.

Although the provision in both is made to include "such investigation of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of cost of production," these words are immediately followed by the words "as authorized by said act," which refer to section 2 of the act of August 5, 1909, in which no power or authority can anywhere be found.

While the provision in these appropriation acts assumes to grant power to investigate the tariff, it is only for the purpose "as authorized by said act," which refers to said section 2, conferring upon the President power to employ "such persons as may be required to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section" in the ascertainment of facts for the application of the maximum and minimum tariff rates.

No power can be held granted, by these provisions, to investigate the tariff for the purpose of furnishing a basis for tariff revision, as no investigation is authorized for such purpose by the act referred to.

Neither of these appropriation bills gives this body even the name or style of a "tariff board" or "tariff commission," but instead leaves them with the meaningless designation of "such persons."

Neither of these appropriation bills empowers this body to examine witnesses under oath or to compel the production of books or papers or to proceed with even the common formalities to observe truth or to guard against error. Neither of these appropriation bills empowers this body to investigate the tariff nor gives authority to obtain reliable tariff data for the basis of tariff revision.

And the amendment now offered to this bill merely follows the language of the appropriation acts of June 25, 1910, and March 4, 1911, and likewise makes no provision for the examination of witnesses under oath, nor for the production of books or papers, nor for the common formalities to observe truth or to guard against error, nor for any investigation of the tariff for the purpose of obtaining reliable data for use as the basis of tariff legislation.

But I am in favor of and will support a good-faith tariff board, not because I have greater confidence in such a body than I have in a special committee directing an investigation with the aid of experts and statisticians, but because the existence and experience of such a body would clear the atmosphere of delusive claims made only to delay and postpone tariff revision, and because I believe that Congress should keep an open door to all information from whatever source relating to the adjustment of the tariff and in obedience to all party demands until the people are relieved from the burden of excessive tariff taxes.

I am in favor of a tariff or revenue board to be nominated by both the majority and minority of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, elected by said House, and made responsible to both the House and the Senate, instead of appointed, controlled, and directed by one-man power—the Executive only. The long fight from monarchy to republic has been to wrest power from one man usurping the rights of the people and their chosen representatives and exercising both legislative and executive authority. Even the power vested in the Speaker of the House of Representatives over the appointment of committees has had to be reclaimed to the whole of the people's representative to prevent abuse and to secure consideration for popular demands.

I am opposed to the exercise of such legislative power by a Republican President. I am opposed to such legislative power being exercised by a Democratic President. I am opposed to the exercise of such legislative power by any President or by any one man clothed with either legislative or executive authority. The grant of such legislative power to be exercised by the Executive is reactionary and a move to evade and postpone the popular will.

I am in favor of a Tariff Board empowered to examine witnesses under oath and to compel the production of books and papers for verification. Such power is a necessary preliminary to the validity of the simplest judgments of inferior courts for the smallest amount of money or for an order calling for the most trivial mandate or injunction, and without which all is a nullity and without force or credit. I am in favor of a Tariff Board empowered to make thorough investigation and examination into production, commerce, and trade of the United States and of foreign nations, and of all conditions affecting the same, and to obtain information useful in tariff legislation, including all power and authority embraced in the amendments offered in the Senate to the Payne law by the Insurgent Republicans and rejected, voted down, and stricken out by the Senate Finance Committee and by the House conferees during the consideration of the Payne law.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, has all time been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes are remaining.

Mr. MALBY. How much time is there left?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, very little can be added upon this side of the House with reference to the necessity and propriety of adopting the amendment which I have offered.

I have listened with extreme interest to my friends on the opposite side, in the hope that they might state, for the benefit of the House and the country, something that would indicate their exact position with reference to the tariff; but I have not heard them offer an intelligent explanation, so that the common people can understand exactly what they may expect if the Democratic policies go through.

Whether they are in favor of free trade, or whether they are in favor of a tariff for revenue only, I do not know. They content themselves with saying that the present tariff is an iniquitous kind of a measure. Whether it is so because it affords protection to our industries, or affords too much protection, I do not know, because none of them has defined just what they mean when they make their charges in relation to it.

I want to say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that so far as I am concerned I want the tariff of this country to be made high enough, so that the laboring men of this country will be permitted to manufacture what the people of this country have to use and wear. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I am in favor of whatever tariff is high enough to accomplish that purpose.

I appreciate the fact that when over $1,500,000,000 worth of goods are imported from foreign countries, as they were into this country during the past year, those goods have replaced an equivalent, or at least a large amount, of American labor and American prosperity in order that the importation might be made; and the smaller that importation is, within the bounds of reason, I am in favor of providing that the benefit shall go to the American laborers and the American citizen. In order that we may ascertain what that tariff shall be, I am in favor of getting all the information that we can upon that subject, including that which will come from the Tariff Board.

But if we can not have a Tariff Board, I would rather have the Payne-Aldrich bill, the McKinley bill, or the Dingley bill, under which this country has had more prosperity than it ever had before in all the country's existence. [Applause on the Republican side, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have a count.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 81.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. MALBY.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 72.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

EXECUTIVE.

To enable the President to continue, by the employment of accountants and experts from official and private life, such officials to receive no compensation beyond their official salaries, to more effectively inquire into the methods of transacting the public business of the Government only in the several executive departments and other executive Government establishments, with the view of inaugurating new or changing old methods of transacting such public business so as to attain greater efficiency and economy therein, and to ascertain and recommend to Congress what changes in law may be necessary to carry into effect such results of his inquiry as can not be carried into effect by Executive action alone, and for each and every purpose necessary hereunder, including the employment of personal services at Washington or elsewhere, $75,000: Provided, That not exceeding three persons may be employed hereunder at rates of compensation exceeding $4,000 per annum. And a report hereunder shall be submitted at the last regular session of the Sixty-second Congress and not later than December 31, 1912.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry. This says a report shall be submitted not later than December 31, 1912. I take it that does not mean a final report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the provision that was incorporated in the bill for the current year a proviso was inserted requiring a report to be made by December 31, 1911. The purpose of this provision is to emphasize, if possible, the necessity of having the information submitted to Congress not later than the 1st of January. If it is to be of any value to the House in the preparation of the appropriation bills it should be submitted by the date designated.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman about that. There is such a provision in the current law, and various reports have been submitted, but they have not been final reports. I take it this does not mean a final report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman understands that this provision is in the bill by consent. The only authority for this commission is the appropriation. It does not exist by virtue of any specific statute. The purpose is to make as emphatic as possible the fact that if these investigations are to be of service to us, the information should be submitted, so far as possible, at a time during the session when it can be utilized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not now desire to delay the reading of that part of the bill which immediately follows, in which the public buildings are contained, and in which a number of gentlemen are interested, but I shall ask the privilege of the committee later on to speak in connection with the paragraph just read on the subject of a budget, both from the executive and the legislative end, and I make that statement now, in order that I may not be forclosed in having that opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lebanon, Tenn., post office: For commencement of building under present limit, $1,000.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I made some reference the other day, when this bill was first being considered, to the condition of buildings system in which gentlemen of the House are, or should be, interested.

Last fall I was talking to the Supervising Architect, and it was then represented to me that a request upon that department for a substantial appropriation for the building at Lebanon, Tenn., would be asked for in this sundry civil bill; not some future bill, but the pending appropriation bill. Naturally that information was communicated to the people who were interested. At some period of time since last fall the proposed action of the Supervising Architect's Office was modified so that now only a nominal appropriation is asked for and inserted in the bill by the Appropriations Committee.

I was also informed at a later and more recent date by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that under the system of construction of public buildings by the Treasury Department, if Congress should appropriate for buildings in any given amount that had not first been requested by the department in its estimates, this money would lie idle in the Treasury, and the Treasury Department would not direct the Supervising Architect's Office to utilize it. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] if that is his understanding as to the present workings of the system over there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding is that these buildings are numbered, and that the department takes them up in their order, and even though an appropriation was made for some building out of its order, unless requested by the department for some special reason the department would not take up that building.

Mr. HULL. That is in conformity with the information given to me by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why not try it, to find out?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I was just coming to that phase of the matter, and certainly expect to do so. This illustrates the criticism I offered some days ago, in part, as to the operation of that department, as it relates to the public-building system. I think that Congress ought to designate the amount of money it desires expended annually in building construction, and not the Secretary of the Treasury. Congress ought to prescribe directions, or at least to retain control, over this construction work to a sufficient extent to enable us to know with some degree of definiteness when a building will be taken up or as to how the general building regulations of the Treasury Department shall be applied. As it is, no Member can tell what the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. He may direct the expenditure of $15,000,000 one year and $10,000,000 another year, with a result that the people interested, and the Members here who are held responsible to the people, know nothing for certain or with any degree of certainty as to what the policy of the Treasury Department will be the next year or the year after, or at any future time. Hence, when a building or buildings will be taken up can not be definitely known. If I did not think this committee would overrule the present action of the Treasury Department without waiting to adopt a law giving Congress immediate direction and control over this phase of it, I would hesitate to offer an amendment increasing this appropriation to $10,000; but I know the Supervising Architect's office, if the judgment of architects on the outside is worth anything, can do much more work than it is now doing, and it should be directed, if possible, to do more work. They have several hundred models of $50,000 buildings on file, and so it is entirely unnecessary for a new design, new drawings and specifications to be prepared in each instance. That is a useless expense.

I do not know whether this method of new plans is utilized as a means of delaying this work, but I do know, Mr. Chairman, that we owe it to ourselves to retain enough control over the operations of this immense department to have some definite idea as to what amount would be expended annually in this construction work and as to when buildings will be constructed. As it is now, a Member of Congress in one State may have a building completed before a building in his colleague's adjoining district will be taken up and the work of construction commenced. It is impossible to make the people understand this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, line 8, by striking out "one thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "ten thousand."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up the time of the committee unduly, but it is not real often that I consume much of the time of the committee or of the House. This is intended to get before the committee the question as to whether it desires to indorse the operation and present bad system, which has been devised by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which is in operation in the Treasury Department with respect not only to the amount annually expended in the construction of public buildings, but in respect to the method and the time of constructing buildings by that department. If it is the desire of the House that the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue to exercise absolute direction and control in all these respects, that Congress shall retain no control with respect to the preparation of drawings, location of sites and buildings, and the time and the order in which they are constructed, but that it shall be left entirely to the Treasury Department, then I would not expect the House or the committee to adopt this amendment, but I would be obliged to allow the work of constructing this building to remain in abeyance until the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury moved him to direct that work shall proceed under the vicious system now in vogue.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. In the gentleman's opinion, would the appropriation of this additional amount of money cause the Secretary of the Treasury to expend the money any sooner than he otherwise would do it?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I will be perfectly frank and say that my investigations, in so far as they have extended as to the system and its operations in the Supervising Architect's office, lead me to the unalterable conclusion that instead of expending 6 per cent as expenses in the office in connection with the work of constructing public buildings it could be done for probably one-half of that, and that instead of preparing such a large number of separate drawings and specifications for each $50,000 building or $75,000 building the office can take the same model and with but slight alterations make it apply as successfully as a new drawing would apply to a particular site. Of course I know the Treasury Department takes the position that, under the circumstances stated by the gentleman, it would not do the work until next spring and that the money would lie idle in the meantime.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not prevail. It will be manifestly unjust to a large number of the Members of this House to have the committee adopt this amendment. The estimates submitted originally to Congress for public buildings carried the amounts required until June 30, 1913. At the request of the committee, and following the precedent established in 1910, the Supervising Architect's Office revised this estimate so as to indicate the amount of money required on various buildings up until March 4, 1913, when the next sundry civil appropriation bill will become a law. This building at Lebanon, Tenn., is No. 93 upon the list. Provision is made in the pending bill for all buildings up to No. 70. To increase this appropriation is to advance this particular building over 22 buildings which under the system adopted have a priority at the present time. About 30 buildings for which estimates were submitted in the original estimates have been eliminated or the estimates greatly reduced, because less will be required for use until March 4, 1913. Because of the fact that contracts will not be entered into before the 4th of March, 1913, some have been eliminated from the bill. If the appropriation be made, the money could not be expended, and it is simply a question of adding to this bill the original estimates for the entire fiscal year——

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Which would be more than $5,000,000 in excess of that which it now carries. The committee has recommended the various sums required and has treated everybody fairly and impartially. To provide for these buildings in the order in which they have been numbered after the acquisition of sites is the only equitable method to follow.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the reasons on which the gentleman's committee has acted, but I desire to ask him this question. It was not my fault that the department recommended to me that they would ask for a substantial appropriation in this bill, not in some future bill, and they have thoroughly misled me and the people interested. Now, my contention is that they have not made such representations to other gentlemen, and it is an act of bad faith to mislead a Member or any person with respect to this work, and this is seeking, through the agency of Congress, to make the appropriations and give them an opportunity to make good on the promises they made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand from the statement which was made by the gentleman from Tennessee and which he published for the information of the people of his community that misunderstandings can easily result, which perhaps unless thoroughly explained will be perhaps embarrassing to gentlemen and perhaps create an improper impression in the community. In the original estimate submitted to Congress it is pointed out by the department that this particular building, which is No. 93 on the list, will be taken up in November, 1912, for plans, but no contract can be in force prior to April, 1913. Now either one or the other thing should be done. Either this bill should carry appropriations for every building for the entire fiscal year, and all the five million and odd thousand dollars necessary for the balance of the year from the 4th of March until the 30th of June should be included in this bill, or else no further appropriations should be made for these particular buildings. How could any of the gentlemen in the House, with a building authorized in his district, finding himself in the same position as the gentleman from Tennessee, justify the failure to have reinserted in this bill an appropriation that could not be utilized, even if made, before the next bill becomes a law, if we make an exception in any one case? If those gentlemen would not be sufficiently informed that the committee determined to take that action, they would be awakened before this bill finally became a law, and it means to add eventually over $5,000,000 to this bill if we depart from the rule to treat everybody impartially——

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the gentleman if they have made provision in this bill for every public building where the money can not be utilized before another bill would be passed?

Mr. CARTER. At another session.

Mr. FOSTER. At the next session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have made provision for all money that can be expended upon every building authorized until the 4th of next March, when the next bill will become a law. It would be manifestly unjust to other Members to make a different ruling for one building or to make an exception for one building and place all the other Members in an embarrassing position. For instance, the gentleman from Illinois has a building in his district——

Mr. FOSTER. Mount Vernon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mount Vernon, and it was included in the original estimates for $20,000 or $30,000. No money can be used on that building before the 4th of March, and it has been entirely dropped out of this bill. What position would the gentleman from Illinois be in if money that could not be utilized were put in for some other building and the building in his district did not appear? And the same would be true of a great number of Members of the House. It would require that this bill be increased over $5,000,000 to place all the items in the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman speaks about buildings coming in a certain order, or rather being of certain numbers on the list. I expect we have all been embarrassed considerably from not getting appropriations for public buildings already authorized. I have made some investigation of this matter and would like the gentleman to state for the benefit of other Members upon what the order of appropriation is based.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state that briefly. I reviewed it the other day, and it appears in the RECORD, but I will state it again at this time. My understanding is that after a site is authorized the department sends its agent to select a site, and when a site is finally agreed upon by a representative of the department and the conflicting interests in the various communities have been pacified the United States district attorney in the district in which the community is located is instructed to search the title.

When he finishes that work he sends the abstract of that title to the Treasury Department or to the Department of Justice. At any rate, it comes to the Attorney General for consideration, in order that he may attach the certificate required under the law before the site can be purchased. As soon as the title is approved by the Attorney General, that site is given the number next in order, and the plans are prepared for buildings in the order in which they have been numbered.

Mr. CARTER. And then the appropriation is authorized just in order as title to the site is acquired? How is the percentage of money apportioned? Will the gentleman state that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Supervising Architect determines how much money can be expended during the given period on that particular building, and whatever the department states can be expended the committee recommends in the bill. It makes no change whatever. In this bill those sums which can be expended up to the 4th of March, 1913, are included. Ten thousand dollars can not be expended on this particular building. No contract will be entered into until next April. I repeat it would be a manifest injustice to a very great number of gentlemen to appropriate for this building upon a different rule than that which applies to others.

Mr. CARTER. My home town had a building authorized two years ago. They had some trouble acquiring a site, and it is, I am informed, No. 99 on the list now. Can the gentleman give me any information as to when I may expect an appropriation for that building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the name of the place?

Mr. CARTER. Ardmore.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Here is the information we have about Ardmore, Okla.:

Post office and courthouse. Building has been authorized. Limit of cost, $150,000. Population of the community is 8,618. Postal revenues, $23,134. Drawings have not yet been commenced. The annual cost of maintaining this building after it is constructed will be $7,185.80, and the present facilities at Ardmore are costing the Government $3,092 a year.

Mr. CARTER. Is not that a very good showing, from the standpoint of economy, when compared to the usual case?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will require interest on an investment of about $150,000 and about $4,100 additional.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is giving me information I did not ask for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought the gentleman might be glad to have his memory refreshed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; just a minute. The statement of the Supervising Architect as to the building at Lebanon, Tenn., which is No. 93 on the list, is that the drawings will be taken up for preparation in November next, and the contract will be entered into in April. It would appear in that event that if the site is already obtained in Ardmore and it is only sixth removed from Lebanon, that provision should be made for it in the next sundry civil bill. That would be my impression.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one more question. Does the sundry civil bill that will be passed next year at the close of the Congress, with the provision for public buildings, become available on the 4th of March?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Appropriations for public buildings become available as soon as made, and remain available until expended.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I notice now, for instance, the town of McAlester, on page 12, and the town of Chickasaw, on page 5. Both of these towns were appropriated for in the same bill and the amounts are practically the same. I think both are about $150,000. I think the amounts are identical. I notice, however, that in one instance $70,000 is carried and in another instance $20,000, and I wondered if there was a uniform rule by which the department would determine, and why the difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would probably be due to the fact that more delay had occurred in obtaining a site in one place than in the other, and as a result the work would be so much further behind on one. The same amount of money could not be utilized within the fixed time.

Mr. FERRIS. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly aware that there ought to be a fair and impartial treatment of all the projects that have been authorized by law, and that one building project should have the same treatment that another receives. I think, however, that under all the facts that have come out in the discussion of this matter here and the general discussion of this bill, it is apparent that the Supervising Architect and his force are not exactly and accurately informed as to when they can complete each of these projects—that is, to the extent of submitting plans and letting out contracts.

Now, the first estimate was that they expected to let out these contracts—from 70 up to 100, as I remember it, although I am not certain about the number—this fall, beginning in September and October and along there. Since that time they have changed their calculations. I have a building project for a public building at Shelbyville, Tenn., for which, in the estimate submitted by the Treasury Department, $23,000 was recommended for the purpose of beginning and carrying on that public building at Shelbyville. Since that they have revised their recommendations and have cut that amount down from $23,000 to $1,000.

Now, in view of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that it has become manifest upon the floor, from the discussion here and from facts that have not been controverted, that the Treasury Department—the Supervising Architect's department—does not pursue uniform lines all the time, that they do not travel at the same gait all the time, that sometimes they proceed with the construction of more buildings per month than they do at other times—upon the calculation that the project might be reached in September or October, it does seem to me that the public building at Shelbyville, Tenn., as well as that of my colleague from Lebanon, Tenn., might reasonably be reached before the 4th of March next, and the passing of this amendment and the adoption of the amendment that I have here ready to offer as to the building at Shelbyville, Tenn., will certainly do no harm to the Public Treasury if the money is not called for. But in the event this building will be begun at or near the time first estimated, or approximately near that time, we might use the money some months earlier. And as to Shelbyville, Tenn., if I could get an amendment substituting $20,000 for the $1,000, or $10,000 for $1,000, it could be started five or six months earlier, perhaps, than if we were compelled to wait until the next appropriation bill passes.

Now, under this condition of affairs it does seem to me to be reasonable and fair to ask that as to these buildings, between the number of 70 and 100, a sufficient allowance be made to start the work in operation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true, upon the basis that has been applied to the preceding number—preceding the 70—that only between $250,000 and $300,000 would cover the number from 70 up to 100, as the gentleman suggests?

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand so.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; when my colleague finishes.

Mr. HULL. And it is also true that the Supervising Architect's Office could commence the construction of a dozen buildings a month instead of 10 buildings a month, as it has recently been doing?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is unquestionably true. There is no excuse, in my judgment, for the delay in starting these buildings. There is no reason for not utilizing the plans and designs that are already in the office, and the people of those places where the buildings are to be located would be perfectly satisfied with them, I have no doubt.

Now I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. PAGE. I simply wanted to make this statement to the gentleman: The Supervising Architect has stated to the Committee on Appropriations, and through us to the House, that so much money can be expended between now and the 4th of next March, and that sum of money has been written in the bill. Now, how much would the gentleman's community benefit if we should write in the bill an excess of that amount, when the Supervising Architect can not and will not spend it?

Mr. HOUSTON. I confess that if he will not spend it we would not be advantaged one whit.

Mr. PAGE. He says he can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope this amendment will pass, and I shall vote for it. I have prepared an amendment to offer for Shelbyville. I think this building and the one at Shelbyville and the others in the category which I have named should receive a substantial amount sufficient to begin the work in the event they may be reached sooner than the 4th of March next.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the debate on the amendment that has been offered makes it very clear that this piece of legislation is a gigantic fraud. It is a delusion, and it will prove to be a snare. It is sailing under false colors, with bare poles, straight on the rocks of deficiency. It is not what it claims to be. Its title is that of a bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913; but the Members responsible for it admit that it does not carry any items, particularly for public buildings, rivers and harbors, and many other things sufficient to provide for the public service beyond the 4th of March next; so that the bill is not a sundry civil bill for the fiscal year, but a sundry civil bill for the benefit of the Democratic campaign this fall.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman is certainly aware that the sundry civil bill in prior Congresses, when the Republican Party was in the majority, appropriated for these items only until the 4th of March of the succeeding year, or if he is not so informed, he can and should be informed.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows, and we all know who are informed on the subject, that to a certain limited extent, and only in one or two cases, bills have been scaled down somewhat along the lines suggested by the gentleman, but it never was a good policy, it never was a justifiable policy, and it never has been carried to an extent that is comparable to the extent to which it is carried in this bill.

Mr. PAGE. May I inquire of the gentleman why he did not turn his batteries of criticism upon his own side of the House when they did exactly the same thing? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Because our side of the House never appropriated in this way to anything like the extent that this bill does.

Mr. PAGE. I am sure the gentleman does not want that statement to go into the RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. PAGE. That they never did it? The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MONDELL. I am perfectly willing to appeal to the RECORD, and I say again that no sundry civil appropriation bill, or any other appropriation bill, has ever been brought into this House which limited the appropriations to the next 4th of March to anything like the extent that this bill so limits the items carried.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill limits until the 4th of March appropriations for river and harbor work, public-building work, fortifications, and for the Panama Canal.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The appropriations for fortifications have always been so limited.

Mr. MONDELL. Not always, by any means.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Always since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, which goes far enough back. Since I have been a member of that committee they have been limited to the 4th of March in a session like this. The river and harbor appropriation during that period——

Mr. MONDELL. Not all the time or to the same extent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that it has always been made in this same way; and for public buildings the appropriations were made in this way commencing in 1910. In my opinion, it was not done for the purpose of enabling the Republicans to make a good showing in the campaign of 1910 on their appropriations, but it was done because these appropriations become available when made, continue available until expended, are not made with reference to the fiscal year, and an investigation disclosed that appropriations were being made which resulted in the unnecessary and unjustifiable tying up of public money; and the sum of $10,000,000 is now to the credit of public buildings, appropriated, which can not be expended during the next fiscal year.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman attempts to excuse what has been done to an inexcusable extent in this bill by the argument that to a certain limited extent appropriation committees have sinned in this respect in the past.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not agree with that statement.

Mr. MONDELL. They never have erred to anything like the extent that the committee have sinned in this case, and it is no justification to their committee that other committees have sinned in like manner, to a very limited extent in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for five minutes more. A good deal of my time was taken by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, there never was and there never will be any justification for this sort of an appropriation. Appropriation bills should be what they purport to be, appropriation bills for the fiscal year. I am surprised that the gentleman from New York should attempt to impose upon the credulity of the House by the suggestion that this kind of legislation prevents the tying up of public money. Everybody knows that the appropriation bills do not tie up money. Not a dollar is tied up by an appropriation. There is not money enough in the Treasury at the time we pass the appropriation bills to pay them all. Every Member of the House knows that the money is constantly coming in and constantly going out. What is gained by appropriating in one bill for 8 months and then in the next bill appropriate for 16 months? What sense is there in that sort of a thing? If the gentleman says you tie up money by appropriating for 8 months, how does he justify appropriations in the short session for 16 months?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was not responsible for it, and I did not criticize in a partisan manner what I knew to be a proper appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not care what committee has been guilty of it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman should have awakened to that some time during the 16 years in which his party had control and the practice was indulged in.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that the practice has not been indulged in 16 years. It began only a few years ago. It was only two years ago that a bill was brought in with any considerable reduction, and there has never been a bill brought in here in which a large proportion of the appropriations were scaled down to an eight-month basis.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to match my recollection against the gentleman's about these matters.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not fair to the House, it is not fair to the country to pass one appropriation bill covering 8 months and then another covering 16 months following it. The country is misled as to the amount of the expenditures of the Government. It is difficult to keep track of the expenditures. You talk about its being done for the purpose of avoiding the tying up of public money; that is all gammon. These bills do not tie up any money.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that nearly all of this money appropriated for the next fiscal year has to be raised after the 1st of July.

Mr. MONDELL. The money is coming in all the time and is being expended all the time. There is never a time when the appropriation bills are being passed when there is money enough in the Treasury to pay all the appropriations if it were necessary to pay them all at one time. This thing of attempting to fool the people by bringing in eight months appropriation bills has no justification, no matter if it has been practiced somewhat in the past.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not feel very much grieved over the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. He has suffered a good deal lately. The facts that came out in connection with the public building desired in a city by the name of Sundance, a city that had a population of several hundred people, in which there was to be spent on the building many thousands of dollars, would have disturbed me considerably if I had been from that State and been as zealous in obtaining appropriations out of the Public Treasury as the gentleman was.

I appreciate also his sensitiveness due to the facts that have come out in connection with Fort D. A. Russell and the expenditures of money that have been made for that fort in his State. But for my own part I never had a great deal of sympathy with much of the clamor for public buildings. I hold in my hand a statement prepared by the Treasury Department which shows the cost of maintenance of public buildings authorized since 1902 will be $3,163,177.41, and that the cost for rental and other expenses in buildings that would otherwise be used by the Government for the same cities and towns would amount annually to $818,169.30.

In other words, the result of the erection of all the public buildings that have been authorized since 1902 when completed will be to increase the annual cost to the Government over $2,000,000, without counting interest on the seventy-two millions spent for such buildings. For my part, I think we could go a little more slowly still, particularly in view of the illustration we have had of the ability of gentlemen to get consideration by committees of bills such as the one relating to the very popular city of Sundance. In point of fact, the Committee on Appropriations, not feeling that it lay within the province of that committee to undo the work of Congress touching public buildings, has brought in a recommendation for every dollar of money which can properly be expended until the money in the next appropriation bill will become available. For my part, I never have heard a reason that could be advanced for appropriating money in advance of the time when it can be used. We have simply pursued what has been the frequent policy of the Committee on Appropriations heretofore, and which, to my mind, is a common-sense business proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have been watching appropriation bills more or less for a number of years, and it is news to me, absolutely news, that the river and harbor appropriations and the public building appropriations heretofore have been made only on the basis of the fiscal year ending March 4, instead of with June 30.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman that, whether or not it is news, it is a fact.

Mr. MANN. I have had some appropriations with reference to rivers and harbors made in my district, and as to those I know that it is not the fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. I am not mistaken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is my business to know, and I know, and I will put the proof in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not put into the RECORD the proof as to the appropriations which have been made in my district, as to rivers and harbors, some of which have been carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and which have been made upon an estimate originating with the War Department for the full fiscal year, which have been carried in full in the sundry civil appropriation bill. What is the use of saying to me, when the department makes an estimate for the full fiscal year and the appropriation bill carries the full estimate, that they have made an appropriation only until the 4th of March? I think that has usually been the case with the sundry civil appropriations as to rivers and harbors.

Nor do I quite understand what the gentleman means as to the appropriations until the 4th of March in this bill. What is the estimate for the Lebanon post office that is now under construction for the next fiscal year? The estimate is made by the fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman want to know that?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is $20,000.

Mr. MANN. The full amount is carried in this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said $1,000. I do not know what the estimate is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said $20,000.

Mr. MANN. Was there not a revised estimate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A revised estimate.

Mr. MANN. For how much?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. For the next fiscal year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the amount that could be utilized until the 4th of March.

Mr. MANN. The estimate submitted by the department is an estimate for the fiscal year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me state what happened, and the gentleman can see what is the fact. In the regular Book of Estimates, not carried as totals, there is a statement that certain specific sums could be expended on the buildings therein designated by the 30th of June, 1913.

Mr. MANN. The full fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And then the department, at the request of the committee, pursuant to the plan adopted in 1910, submitted estimates of amounts that would be necessary until the 4th of March, 1913, and it is those sums that this bill carries.

Mr. MANN. Let us see. Here is the Lawrenceburg, Ky., post office, the item just preceding, carrying $30,000. What was the estimate in the regular annual estimates for the next fiscal year for that post office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Forty-three thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. And the bill carries only $30,000? In all of these estimates is the amount reduced in that way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not all of them, but in some. Wherever the original sum requested will be used by the 4th of March it is appropriated; in those instances the department has indicated that fact, and that amount has been given.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly frank to say to the gentleman that I do not know what the custom has been with reference to public buildings, as to whether the full amount has been carried or not, but I do know, as to rivers and harbors, that the estimates which have been made in that way have not been scaled to eight months.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken as to that.

Mr. MANN. But I am not mistaken, because I have watched it. I will not say that there have been cases, because I do not know, but I know many cases where that has not been done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. An examination of the hearings will tell just exactly what transpired, and I will read just what happened.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended. I desire to read from the record, because I made that statement in the opening discussion of the bill, and I do not wish to misrepresent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the extension of time? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD (reading):

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is river and harbor improvements, beginning on page 195 of the bill. The estimates for the next fiscal year are $12,114,988.

Col. TAYLOR. These are the estimates as submitted on the 1st of July; that is, as they were submitted in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you since revised the estimates?

Col. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be the total under the present estimate? When was this last estimate made?

Col. TAYLOR. It was up to about the 1st of March. I find two or three clerical errors in the statement I have here, and I am not sure that my totals are absolutely right. I have the estimates in two ways here, one for the fiscal year up to June 30, 1913, and one up to March 1, 1913, on the assumption that there will be another sundry civil bill by that time.

So that was not an unusual practice; but it is the practice that has prevailed, according to my recollection, while I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is right about that—and I am satisfied that he is not——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well——

Mr. MANN. Well, that is neither here nor there. But do I understand that the gentleman now claims that these contracts are made at the long session for 8 months? If so, they must be made at the short session for 16 months.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. MANN. That has never been the case in my personal experience, and I do not believe it has been usually the case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it has been the case in my experience; and I am informed by a gentleman who is not usually mistaken about these matters that as to rivers and harbors matters it is a well-established custom of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. MANN. With very few exceptions, the sundry civil bill has carried appropriations every year for a number of years for river and harbor improvements in my district and has always carried them to July 1——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that may be so; and yet——

Mr. MANN. And without any special influence on my part.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These appropriations have rarely, if ever, in my experience, been discussed in the House. I have criticized Republicans to the extent to which appropriations were made, and yet knowing this situation and knowing the purpose that was to be served in making them in this way I never attempted to take advantage of what I knew was the proper thing to do and to make partisan capital out of it, and this bill for these 8 months for river and harbor contract work carries $2,000,000 in excess of the current year made by appropriations for the 16 months.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry the gentleman, every time a gentleman asks a question about an appropriation, feels that we are injecting partisan politics.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit I desire to suggest this: With public buildings we are dealing with contract work; and as with river and harbor contract work there can not be logically any such thing as a fiscal year. There is a certain amount of money necessary to do a given piece of work. Now, it so happens that sometimes a given amount of money within a certain time can be spent in completing or toward the completion of that work, and when you leave outside the question of maintenance, public work like public building is not subject and can not in the nature of things be properly subject to fiscal-year periods.

Mr. MANN. Very true, but the estimates are made according to the fiscal year.

Mr. SHERLEY. But estimates are not such sacred things that they should not accord with a common-sense proposition.

Mr. MANN. Well, there is nothing of a common-sense proposition in the matter at all, the question of whether you make appropriations one year for 8 months and another year for 16 months. If that is a common-sense proposition, why very well, but according to my idea of common sense it would be to make the appropriations for 12 months each year.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit. The gentleman talks about an appropriation for 16 months. You appropriate so much money as can be expended prior to the 4th of March and then you may appropriate so much money as may be expended in three or four months only because you are in the summer months when there is much building, and it is not simply appropriating for 16 months but it is appropriating all the money that can be used toward the completion of the project prior to the time when the new money is available.

Mr. MANN. But here is the point. The gentleman states now in this bill estimates were submitted for the full fiscal year of 12 months and that they have reduced those estimates by one-third so as to make only two-thirds of an appropriation of the estimates.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit, I will say that we simply had in each instance the Supervising Architect tell us how much money could be used prior to the 4th of March. In some instances it did not amount to three-fourths of the estimates; in other instances it did not amount to one-tenth of the estimates; in other instances it amounted to more than three-fourths, according to the stage of the work the building was in. In other words, we simply adopted the common-sense rule of providing money toward the completion of a building for a time sufficient to reach a point when new money would be available.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman answer me one other question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will try.

Mr. MANN. Under what authority of law do these appropriations become available at once?

Mr. SHERLEY. The covering-in act of 1874, I am informed.

Mr. MANN. Of course that act does not provide anything of the kind, but it may be so construed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken, I think, about it.

Mr. MANN. I am not mistaken, because I have just taken the trouble to read it, and I can give the gentleman a better reference to it than he has in the bill, because he has the date wrong there. I had to go and look it up, because it is in the bill as "June 24," 1874, but as Congress adjourned before that date, that could not have occurred, and I finally located it. I give the gentleman the benefit of that, so that he can amend it when that part is reached.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Possibly that is a clerical error.

Mr. MANN. Possibly it is a clerical error.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act of June 20, 1874, is the act to which I referred.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations but a short time and am not familiar with the practice in former years. But I am familiar with the fact that this particular item under discussion has been inserted in the bill upon the same basis as all other appropriations for similar purposes, namely, according to the amount which will be needed before March 4. In the meantime another bill will have been passed to provide the balance necessary.

Now, take a case in my own district. On page 56 of the hearings, taken from the statement submitted by the Supervising Architect concerning the public building for courthouse and post office at Harrisburg, it will appear that the total authorization is $125,000. Forty thousand dollars have already been appropriated. The estimates in the bill are $85,000 more, and the Supervising Architect says:

This work is an extension to an old building. Drawings are under way and a contract will probably be in force by May. As this will allow 14 months of actual construction work prior to July 1, 1913, the full amount estimated will be required.

That is, the full sum of $85,000. We have put in the bill but $35,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the gentleman speaking about now?

Mr. OLMSTED. The Harrisburg (Pa.) post office. I say this item is on the same basis as all the others. I am instancing a case in my own district.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has not looked quite far enough.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think the gentleman has not listened quite far enough.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I may have misunderstood.

Mr. OLMSTED. What I am saying is that although $85,000 will be required by the 1st of July, we have only put $30,000 in the bill, because that is all that will be required before the 4th of March, and that is on the same basis as all the other appropriations of the same kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. And if this particular item is to be amended as desired by the gentleman from Tennessee, then there are 40, 50, or 100 items in here that would have to be amended to put all upon the same basis.

Mr. HULL. Suppose this department exercises the absolute control over this system of building and construction and does not want to expend any money on your building until July, next year, would you be here acquiescing in that course?

Mr. OLMSTED. I suppose I could not help myself. I have a building in my district authorized four years ago and they are just beginning its construction.

Mr. HULL. The point I desire to get before the gentleman is this: The department is swamped in its management of the system as it now exists. Suppose they had partially completed the construction of this building under former appropriations, and if in this bill they should decide not to make a request for any more appropriations, and that they should not do any work until after the 4th of March next year, and then would ask an additional appropriation in that year, and then resume work according to their own idea——

Mr. OLMSTED. They do not do business in that way. When they commence construction they go right through with it. They do not commence it until they have the plans ready. I have had the same difficulty the gentleman has. It arises in large part because we never have appropriated enough money to pay for the necessary assistance in the office of the Supervising Architect to rush these matters through as fast as the gentleman from Tennessee and myself would like to have them.

Mr. HULL. That depends upon whether they desire to construct 10 buildings or 12 buildings or 15 buildings per month, does it not?

Mr. OLMSTED. It depends upon the number of assistants they have in the office to prepare the plans.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken. The hearings taken before the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings and Grounds showed that with an identical appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, they decreased the construction of buildings from 15 to 10 per month.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is because they did not have sufficient assistants.

Mr. GARNER. No. It was done during one fiscal year when they could have constructed 15 buildings per month, and yet they decreased it on account of a deficiency in the Treasury.

Mr. OLMSTED. Of course, if they did not have the money, they could not build the buildings.

Mr. GARNER. They decreased it intentionally in order to relieve the Treasury from the expense.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, if there was a deficiency in the Treasury, that is a sufficient reason; there would certainly be no wisdom in appropriating the money when there was no money to be appropriated.

I merely wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that this item is on the same basis as all other similar items, and if you are going to amend one, you ought also to amend 40 or 50 similar items in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize very much with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] in his desire to see completed the building which has been authorized to be constructed at Lebanon, Tenn. That is one of the centers of thought and culture in that historic State. But I do not think it is very material whether this bill carries $1,000 or $50,000, because, judging the future by the past, no part of that money, whether it is $1,000 or $50,000, will be expended during the next year. The Treasury Department constructs buildings for future generations, never for the present one. The policy seems to be to construct buildings only upon authorizations hoary with age.

As I understand it, the authorization for this building was secured only about two years ago.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me in that connection?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HULL. As I understand the system over there—that is, so far as I can understand it, for I have never been able, even after investigation, to understand it fully, and I think very few Members do understand it—the order in which buildings are listed for construction is determined by the order in which the sites are obtained. The site for this building was authorized four or five years ago; at least four years ago.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I yield——

Mr. PAGE. That is not necessarily true, because a site may be acquired and no appropriation secured for 10 years. An interval of 10 years might elapse between the two.

Mr. HULL. And under this system the site authorized in the bill of 1908 might be secured and the building following in the natural course would not be touched, whereas a building authorized, or a site authorized, in 1910 might be under way and perhaps constructed, because the agent of the Treasury Department or the district attorney's office or some other intervening agency beyond the power of a Member of Congress to control has operated in the first instance to delay it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I was about to remark that it was immaterial when this building was authorized, whether in 1910 or in 1908. I understand that it has just now reached the point where they are considering plans and specifications. I think about the same thing is true with respect to the building authorized for the beautiful city of Ardmore, that is so well represented by my distinguished friend [Mr. CARTER] on my left. My experience has been that when they begin working on the plans and specifications of a building the trouble has just begun. It takes more than a Cæsarian operation to extract a set of plans and specifications from the Supervising Architect's office. They have to be made, altered, amended, changed, substituted, modified, rejected, reconsidered, approved, suspended, and finally adopted before bids are called for. In the usual course of affairs this stage will be reached in about 1915 with the Lebanon building. The situation will just begin to be interesting then. Although Tennessee is well supplied with building material, in all probability the specifications will require stone to be brought from Maine and the cement from over on the Pacific coast; and after the bids come in it will be discovered that the appropriation is not sufficient and that it will require an increase. About the year 1919 the formal letting of the contract will occur. A year or two after that the contractor will seem almost ready to begin the constructing of the building, but some unforeseen occurrence will develop. About 1921 the contractor, for some reason or another, will make default on his contract, and it will be necessary for the Supervising Architect's office to begin all over again. In 1925, on the 4th day of July, the cornerstone of the post-office building at Lebanon, Tenn., will be laid with imposing ceremonies. It is to be hoped that the distinguished gentleman [Mr. HULL] will still be serving as the faithful Representative of that district in this House, and that on the interesting occasion just suggested it will fall to him to deliver the customary oration and to revive the memory of the conditions under which the original authorization was secured. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHARP. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SHARP. To what does the gentleman attribute this delay in these buildings?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I think the gentleman misunderstands me. I am not denominating the lapse of only 15 years a delay.

Mr. SHARP. The last suggestion of the gentleman, in which I heartily join, opens up a field of inquiry that is quite interesting. It has been suggested to me at different times that often this very delay is a good reason for the Representative in this House to appeal to his constituents that in order to have the building completed he must still continue to represent them.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. That is true. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] were a wicked Republican, I would say that this public building would be a substantial basis to be used by him in campaigns for the next 15 or 20 years. [Laughter.] Of course, though, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] has a record here justifying the judgment of his people in electing him, and he is not compelled to resort to such means of securing public favor.

After the corner stone is laid the work will progress with the same proportionate rapidity. The gentleman from Tennessee is now a young man——

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HULL. I notice the gentleman has an item in this bill, or the remnants of an item, pertaining to a building in his State. Does not the gentleman think that the failure of this bill to carry a larger appropriation for his own building in his own district would suggest that some attention be devoted to that in the course of his remarks?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I have been devoting much attention to that, Mr. Chairman, for a number of years. That authorization was made four years ago. For two or three years I indulged the hope that during the course of my life, if I was permitted to live out the allotted span, I might see a public building at Hillsboro, Tex. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is a young man, while I am more advanced in years. I really think there is some probability that the gentleman from Tennessee will live long enough to see his building completed at Lebanon. I have almost abandoned all hope of that in my Texas town. I imagine that when ripe, old age comes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], when he is stooped and bent beneath the burden of his years but still in the service of a grateful constituency, he may be able to participate in the celebration that will occur at Lebanon, Tenn., over the completion of the building the authorization for which he secured so many years before. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HULL. Four or five years ago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side seemed astounded, as if something unusual had been done in this bill in providing for river and harbor work and public-building work until the 4th of March next. I made the statement upon information that that has been the practice of the committee and is not unusual.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the gentleman how usual is that practice?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Gentlemen challenged my statement and said that while they did not doubt that I meant to be accurate, they were quite convinced that I was in error. Now, I intend to prove by the RECORD that I knew what I was talking about, even if it is a matter of recent discovery to other gentlemen.

On the 18th of March, 1908, Mr. Taylor, the Supervising Architect, was before the Committee on Appropriations:

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Tawney). Your estimates for public buildings begin on page 1 of the bill before you and are printed in the bill as they appear in the annual Book of Estimates. Since submitting the annual estimates have you revised them in order to determine the exact amount that you will require to continue the work now authorized until your next appropriation becomes available?

Mr. TAYLOR. I have.

We were then in the long session of Congress in 1908, as we are now in 1912, and that meant that the appropriation or estimates were until March 4, 1909.

On March 30, 1908, in considering the estimates for river and harbor work:

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Tawney) to Gen. McKenzie, who was the chief engineer. Do the amounts suggested in your revised estimates cover the amounts that you would expend between the 1st of July and the time your next appropriation will become available?

Gen. MCKENZIE. There are two statements, one to July 1, 1909, and the other to March 1, 1909.

Mr. TAWNEY. Your appropriations become immediately available when made, and continue available until expended?

Gen. MCKENZIE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So if the amounts estimated as necessary to carry you to the 4th of March next were provided, then the appropriation passed at the next session for river and harbor improvements would become available on the 4th of March and would enable you to continue the work throughout the remainder of this fiscal year, and also during the next fiscal year?

Gen. MCKENZIE. Yes, sir; it would.

In 1910, two years later, we were in the long session of Congress, and on February 22, 1910, Mr. Taylor, the Supervising Architect, being then before the committee:

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Tawney). Will you please take the document beginning on page 31, and state just what the status of the present appropriation is and what is the least amount that will be required that will be necessary to meet the requirements in each case during the fiscal year 1911, taking into consideration the fact that Congress will be in session next December?

Mr. TAYLOR. I have that prepared in a statement, which I will give you.

An examination of the testimony shows that he indicates the sums that would be required for the various buildings until the 1st of March, 1911. For instance, Denver, Colo.: "In view of the fact that there will be only 10 months to March, 1911, it is believed that this estimate," which was for $250,000, "can be safely reduced by $100,000." And in the same year when the river and harbor bill was under consideration in the sundry civil bill, on February 28, 1910, the chairman, Mr. Tawney, said:

Maj. Kavanaugh, in view of the fact that these appropriations become immediately available and remain available until expended without any reference to the fiscal year for which they are made, and also in view of the fact that the next sundry civil appropriation bill will carry the appropriation which will become immediately available before the 4th of March, will you take with you the reduced estimates and go over your testimony, reduce your estimates on the theory of the amount necessary in each case until March 4, or until the next appropriation becomes available?

I do not suppose it is necessary to go back beyond 1908. I know what the practice of this committee has been, although other gentleman may not.

Mr. BUTLER. Was the revision made?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The revision was made and the appropriations were made in accordance with the reduced estimates. I have reviewed the appropriations made by the Republican Congresses on several occasions. I have not attempted to make a case against the Republican Party because of that method of appropriation, knowing that this was not only a sound and proper but the only wise practice that could be followed. I have never criticized the Republican Party for pursuing a proper practice.

This bill follows a practice that has been in force—I will not say for more than four years, because I have only produced the records since 1908, but I can produce them further back—for at least four years. The clerk of the committee, who is well informed and whose memory on these matters is better than mine, informs me that so far as the river and harbor appropriations are concerned, this is the settled, accepted policy of the committee. I was under the impression that we had initiated this policy in regard to public buildings in 1910, but I find upon examination that it was put into force two years earlier, and it may be if I had an opportunity to go back further I should have found that it had been put in force at the very beginning of Mr. Tawney's services as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

These appropriations are made for the purpose of enabling the public service to be carried on in a proper manner. We have not attempted to exercise any discretion over the amounts. Ten million dollars heretofore appropriated for the construction of public buildings, because the estimates were so very liberal, can not possibly be expended during the next fiscal year. That is one of the reasons that has led to the adoption of a policy to make it possible for appropriations to correspond with work that could be done. Nobody is harmed by not making the appropriation larger and nobody is benefited by increasing the appropriation, but to those who have for some reason or other the necessity to examine and discuss and analyze the expenditures of the Government it is disconcerting to find the appropriations out of all proportion to the amounts that are expended. It is very difficult to reconcile appropriations with statements of expenditures prepared by the Treasury Department and most difficult to understand or to have an intelligent comprehension of the fiscal operations of the Government. In reporting this bill to the House I stated frankly what had been done about these matters. I hope that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee, but in view of the eloquent address made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] I became somewhat anxious about the allowance in this bill for a post office in my district, and I desire to ask the chairman, who has given so much study and time to this bill, if he will be kind enough to answer what is meant on page 55 of the hearings with reference to that appropriation of $20,000 for Harrisburg, Ill., being at the bottom of the page, where this language is found:

This building is No. 52 on the active list. Drawings will be taken up in May, and the contract will probably be in force by September, 1912.

I understand that the drawings have not yet been made. I have not that information from the department to-day nor within the last few days, but I have had the information from a member of the committee to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This statement to which the gentleman refers means that some time in the month of May of this year work will be commenced on the plans, and that it would take from that time until September to prepare the plans, to advertise for bids, and to consider the bids and to make the contracts.

Mr. FOWLER. May I safely rely upon the statement that the contract will be let during this fall or some time during this year? The word "probably" is used there. It says that probably the contract will be in force by September, 1912.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this explanation, unless some unforeseen thing happens, the contract will be in force. Frequently a situation like this develops, and it might develop in the gentleman's district. Plans would be prepared and bids invited and the bids would be in excess of the limit of cost.

The department would attempt to eliminate certain items, and the gentleman or his constituents, or the Senator from his State, would protest against the elimination of certain items and request that the matter be held in abeyance until Congress could act again upon the matter. There are several instances in which contracts would have been let for public buildings a year or more in advance were it not for the fact that the Representative from the district, because of the desire of his constituents, preferred that no action be taken until he could have an opportunity to obtain legislation which would increase the limit of cost and thereby permit a more ornamental building than could be constructed within the appropriation. Ordinarily, unless some unforeseen occurrence takes place, I believe these statements can be relied upon. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill carries $20,000, which is the amount of money that is expected will be used for the construction of the building up to the 4th of March next.

Mr. FOWLER. It is not intended to be taken as a limitation upon the amount of money that is to be used?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; it is all of the money that the department will be able to expend between now and the 4th of March.

Mr. FOWLER. And the amount which was originally sought to be appropriated was sixty or sixty-five thousand dollars, as I recollect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Forty thousand dollars, which would carry the work until the 30th of June.

The CHAIRMAN. All time having expired, the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lewes, Del., post office: For commencement of building under present limit, $20,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it has even been my pleasure——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the last word—to hear so much pure sophistry in the same length of time as we have heard from the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from New York with regard to the manner in which these appropriations are submitted.

Mr. BARTLETT. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment that has reference to this particular item.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand he moved to strike out the last word of this paragraph, but this paragraph does not relate to what the gentleman is discussing.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to amend by increasing the amount $5,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I did not make the point of order on the gentleman's amendment, but I made the point of order that he was not speaking to his amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. And I want to call attention of the Chair to the fact that my time has been largely consumed by the gentleman from Georgia. [Laughter.] The gentleman from New York says that no private firm or individual would set aside or appropriate money for a payment beyond the term for which it was appropriated or set aside. Why, certainly not. What we are complaining of is that this committee has not set aside or appropriated or made available enough money to cover the term named in the appropriation. In other words, it is a fraud; it is an appropriation for 8 months, masquerading as an appropriation for 12 months, and the inevitable result will be in the next bill we must appropriate for 16 months.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if it is not good business to set aside money for a full fiscal year, what sort of a business is it to set aside money for a fiscal year and four months more?

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Suppose a building can be completed by the 1st of August, 1913. We appropriate now money enough to supply the work up to the 4th of March. In the next bill we only have to appropriate from March until August instead of 16 months, which illustrates what I said, that there can be no fiscal-year proposition applied to this.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, on the contrary, the estimate is made for the amount of money to be used in the 12 months covered by the bill. That is the estimate which the committee cuts down on the theory that when the short session comes there will be a bill on the 4th of March. Well, that bill, before the 4th of March next, must appropriate from the 4th of March to the 1st of July and from the 1st of July to the next July.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit. The fact is the building or project will be completed in less time.

Mr. MONDELL. It makes not a particle of difference when some particular building is going to be completed. The question is how long the appropriation is to be available—when it is to be used. There is not a Member on either side who can justify a system under which one year we appropriate for 8 months before election and the next year after the election we are expected to appropriate for 16 months. If the facts are as the gentleman has stated with regard to past appropriations, then the last appropriation bill provided for 16 months, this one will be for 8 months, and the next will be for 16 months. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that my withers are not wrung by anything in the bill. Every public building in which I am directly interested as a Representative is, I think, amply provided for. I am objecting to a policy which has no justification from any standpoint. Neither am I worried because he advertises the beautiful little city of Sundance, in my State. If the gentleman will come with me some day to the summit of the beautiful Sundance Mountain, where the Sioux used to dance the sun dance, he will get a broad view that will clear his ideas in regard to these matters.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman I would be at least instructed by the number of inhabitants there.

Mr. MONDELL. We may not have as many as they have in some places, but in quality we have the best on the face of the earth.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest it lacks nothing to the advertisement of the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. How about fishing?

Mr. MONDELL. The fishing is fairly good, but we have secured no more fish hatcheries than the gentleman from Kentucky has.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Wyoming should feel so grieved because I assumed, when he made his criticism, he was not familiar with what had happened in the past. I produced the records in the hope that when he had the cold record before him he might see the light. But he seems not even to accept the record or the statements of former chairmen of the committee. I have taken occasion to look up these matters a little bit, and I think, perhaps, a criticism of this bill might properly be made. Unfortunately, the committee had no power to remedy the situation which would seem to require action.

The gentleman has three buildings in this bill. In one of them the full estimate—$15,000—is given; in the other one the estimate for the entire year was $48,000, and only $30,000 was appropriated; in the third one the estimate for the entire year was $61,000, and only $40,000 was given. It is unfortunate that the practice has not been established heretofore, that the Committee on Appropriations could exercise some discrimination as to whether appropriations should be made for buildings authorized in former bills. For instance, take Rock Springs, Wyo.

The post office is to cost $75,000. The population is 5,778, and the postal revenues $11,487. Maintenance cost, $3,743 when it is finished, while we are now obtaining adequate accommodations there for $700 a year. So that in addition to the interest on the investment of $75,000 a year we make a permanent annual charge on the Government of $3,000 additional for the purpose of having this ornament contributed for the benefit of the people of Rock Springs.

Another building is at Caspar, Wyo. The limit of cost is $55,000. The population is 2,639. Postal revenues, $7,883. The permanent annual charge for maintenance when this building is finished will be $2,836.95. Ample accommodations for the public service are now being obtained in Caspar, Wyo., for the munificent sum of $210. [Laughter.] Then there is Douglas, Wyo. The limit of cost is $65,000 and the population 2,246. The postal revenue is $8,000, and the permanent annual charge in addition to the interest on the investment will be $2,836.95, while we are now obtaining ample accommodations at Douglas, Wyo., for $840.

If anybody has ever been in Wyoming and can recall the picture and the impression upon the mind made by these populous communities, and then can picture buildings thrust right into the landscape, public buildings costing from $55,000 to $75,000, lonesome and out of place, an outrage upon the æsthetic sensibilities of the people of Wyoming, he would realize what a great public service would have been performed by the Committee on Appropriations if, instead of reporting appropriations to continue these three buildings aggregating about $85,000, they had had the temerity to recommend the repeal of the law authorizing them.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman, I suppose, is now quoting statistics concerning buildings that have already been authorized?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the gentleman in his possession the bill that has now been prepared, or all that has been prepared of it, for the next session of Congress, for erection of public buildings?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information about the bill or that it will be prepared.

Mr. PAYNE. I have. I have been solicited for the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will undertake to say that a Democratic House will not report any bill containing recommendations from $10,000 to $50,000 or $75,000 for public buildings in any community the population of which is less than 300. [Applause.]

I have no doubt it must have been overlooked that the House was no longer Republican when such bills passed in another place.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield to a question in that connection? I would like to know, as a matter of information, as to what the basis of this permanent annual expense of the conduct of these buildings is. The gentleman gives a certain amount as being a certain annual charge against the Government. On what is that based?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Supervising Architect has charge of these buildings, having 652 in commission. Based on the experience of the past, he is able to estimate quite correctly the amount that will be required for heat, light, and personal services. The Secretary states that the figures I have read, given in the statement heretofore placed in the RECORD, were based upon averages ascertained by the division of buildings into 16 different classes and prorating the measure of expense, including all the items referred to, in an inquiry submitted by myself, for a period of five years.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman estimate as to what the expense will be?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The estimate, if anything, I am inclined to think is not exaggerated.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have always been of the opinion that no public building should be erected anywhere except where the public business justifies it, and I am still of that opinion. I believe that there ought to be some system adopted under which sufficient information can be obtained upon which to base proper action before public-building bills are enacted into law. If we can rent a building for the transaction of the public business in a given town for $500 a year, we are not justified in spending $100,000 for the construction of a building in that town, or $50,000.

As to the question of the method of appropriation, I believe the committee is right in recommending the appropriation only of the money that can be used. There is no use to appropriate money for the construction of a building the contract for which can not be let for a year or two after the appropriation is made, and if the committee recommends money to be expended in the construction of buildings that can be constructed during the period for which the appropriation is made, then I believe the committee has performed its duty. Whether the appropriation covers a period of 8 months or 16 months, it does not matter. If this committee appropriates for the construction of buildings money that can actually be used during the time between now and the 4th of next March no harm is done, because if there is more money needed for the construction of a particular building after the 4th of March we can make the appropriation before the 4th of March to cover that deficiency.

As a matter of fact, it is not a question of appropriating for 8 months or 16 months. It is a question of appropriating for each particular building, whether it be for 1 month or for 20 months, for 8 months or for 16 months. There is no doubt about that. What is the use and what is the business sense of asking the committee to recommend the appropriation of moneys which the executive branch of the Government says it can not use? The committee ought to be commended for the good sense it displays in accepting the advice of the men who are thoroughly familiar with what use can be made of the money.

If the Supervising Architect says to the Committee on Appropriations that he can use only a thousand dollars at Lebanon, Tenn., for example, why should the committee insist upon letting him have $10,000? If the Supervising Architect says he can use before the 4th of March only $30,000 on a building which requires an ultimate expenditure of $85,000, why should the committee insist upon appropriating more than $30,000? I congratulate the committee upon the wisdom of its action. It is acting in a sensible and businesslike way.

There ought to be no politics in this. This is a business proposition, and whether the Democratic committee is doing what it is doing for the purpose of making political capital, or for whatever purpose it may be doing it, I do not care. For one Member of the House, I believe that all this business ought to be done on a businesslike and nonpartisan basis. I am not standing here as a Republican or a Democrat, trying to make political capital out of a thing that ought to be done for purely business purposes. [Applause.] I am opposed, first, to the appropriation of any money for any building in any town in the United States where the population of that town and the receipts of the public service there do not justify an appropriation for the construction of a public building. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

McAlester (Okla.) post office and courthouse: For completion of building under present limit, $70,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 22, strike out the word "completion" and insert in lieu thereof the word "continuation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

New Haven (Conn.) post office: For continuation of building under present limit, $125,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill for certain information in regard to the hearings contained in Part VI. I notice that the expense of maintenance of the proposed building at New Haven is $38,441.98. The annual rental and other expenses is $600. What does that mean? It is found on page 16 of Part VI of the hearings.

Mr. PAGE. What town?

Mr. TILSON. New Haven, Conn. In giving some information to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a few minutes ago the chairman of the committee used the figures contained in this table, giving the amount of rental which was already being paid by the Government, and comparing it with the maintenance of the new building when completed. Does this same thing apply to the building with reference to New Haven?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The estimate is based on the experience of the department, and a compilation of data.

Mr. TILSON. It is very patent that the expenses of maintaining a building suitable for a post office at such a place as New Haven would be more than $600. The rental would be very much more than that, of course. I was wondering what that information meant.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be inaccurate, but it is presumably the estimated cost of rentals and other expenses. There may have been a figure dropped in the printing. I can not answer as to that.

Mr. TILSON. There is an old post-office building in New Haven, and as a matter of fact the Government has not been paying any rental for the post office.

Mr. SHERLEY. It may be, then, that the $600 represents the cost of maintenance of that building now as compared with the estimated cost of maintenance when the new building is completed.

Mr. TILSON. That could not be, because the maintenance of the building, including heat, light, and watchmen, would certainly be a great deal more than that. I wondered if it did not refer to outside quarters. The Government has had to rent quarters outside of the post-office building for some purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That contains a statement of annual rental and other expenses. In the event that there is a public building there at present, there would be no statement of annual rent, unless there were some place rented outside of the present public building. I think we all appreciate that the cost of maintaining a public building at New Haven, a city of some 130,000 population, is considerably in excess of $600.

Mr. TILSON. It occurred to me that it made a very bad showing if that was what it was intended to represent, because sufficient quarters for a post office in New Haven could not be obtained for $600. As the matter stands, explanation is necessary to save it from being meaningless or actually misleading.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When this document was sent to me, appreciating its importance and the value of the information contained in it, I took the precaution to send it back to the Treasury Department to check up the figures, so that if there be a mistake, due to an oversight, it might be corrected. I think it is explained by the fact that there was no attempt to place in that column of annual rental and other expenses the present cost of maintaining the public building which is in existence, and in that respect it may be somewhat misleading.

Mr. TILSON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is getting late in the afternoon, and gentlemen will soon be going away. I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I suppose he would like to run through the public-building items to-night if he can. What is the purpose of the gentleman in regard to to-morrow?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I intend to request that when the House adjourn to-night it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. It is the expectation that the committee will sit until about 2 o'clock and then rise, and then the House will adjourn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shelbyville, Tenn., post office: For commencement of building under present limit, $1,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 10, amend by striking out the words "one thousand dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "ten thousand dollars."

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman will let me call his attention to the fact that instead of striking out "$1,000" in the item for Shelbyville, Tenn., he is striking it out in the item of Searcy, Ark.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, my amendment should apply to page 19, line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be modified in accordance therewith.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to say anything further in regard to this matter. I have already set forth the reasons why I think it ought to be adopted, and I do not wish to take up further time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the enlargement of the power plant, including additional boilers, settings, connections and appliances, tunnels, and ducts, complete, to equip the same for supplying heat and steam to the present buildings and to the new building heretofore authorized to be constructed for said bureau, $50,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This seems to be an appropriation for a power plant in the new Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I want to ask the gentleman from New York if this appropriation is made without regard to the question of a central heating plant, about which the committee had an investigation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is needed in any event.

Mr. CANNON. Whether the central heating plant is agreed upon or not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If a central heating plant is agreed upon, this money will be expended for boilers that will be utilized in that plant. If it be not agreed upon, the boilers are needed in any event. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee have the right later, if it so desires, to offer an amendment in relation to the proposed plant mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois. The Treasury Department submitted a plan for the construction of a central heating plant designed to take care of certain public buildings.

All of the information desired was not in the possession of the committee at the time this bill was reported, and therefore it had not been able to determine what would be the most desirable thing to do, but before the bill is concluded it is possible that the committee will reach some definite agreement. I ask unanimous consent that we have the right to offer it at this point if the amendment should be thought desirable.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means to ask unanimous consent to have the right to recur for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I do not mean that the point of order should be waived.

Mr. CANNON. In that same connection, at the end of line 2, page 22, the central heating plant would be in order, and I take it the gentleman desires leave to return to that point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Line 21, page 21, would be a more proper place, I think, directly after the enlargement of the present power plant.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman is correct. I want to say in passing that I am inclined to think, from what little knowledge I have about it, that the central heating plant ought to be provided for from a standpoint of economy and safety.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to say, and I think everybody is in accord with this statement, that the matter is one of great importance, and, like a number of other very important matters that should be considered at this time, the tremendous amount of work that devolved upon the committee made it impossible to reach an intelligent conclusion on several matters. We hope before the bill is concluded that the committee may be able to present a plan for the action of the House. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to the paragraph beginning with line 17, page 21, for the purpose of offering an amendment for a central heating plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the consent will be granted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

So much of the urgent deficiency act approved August 5, 1909, as authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to procure from certain engineers plans and specifications for the mechanical and electrical equipment of the new Bureau of Engraving and Printing Building is repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that. Has the power proposed to be repealed been exercised at all?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MANN. The bottom paragraph on page 21.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was. A contract was made with certain engineers——

Mr. MANN. All I wanted to know is, whether this affects in any way any outstanding contract or arrangement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I will state briefly the facts, because I think they ought to be in the RECORD. A contract was made with a firm of engineers to plan and design the mechanical equipment for this building. The compensation was fixed, my recollection is, at 3½ per cent upon the cost, with a provision that the compensation would not be in excess of $12,000. After the plans were about 85 or 90 per cent completed, because of some rearrangement of the building, the engineers were requested to suspend work, and then certain modifications were requested. They submitted plans based upon this contract, aggregating in cost $22,000 or $23,000. They were actually paid $19,000 for the incomplete plans, while under their contract they should not be paid in excess of $12,000. They have submitted in addition claims aggregating $6,000 more. The department is having the plans prepared in the Supervising Architect's Office, and it requested that the law be repealed, so as to end that situation and not make it possible to have any recurrence under it. This provision is put in at the request of the department, and in the belief of everybody who has looked into it the provision should be repealed. The same is true with regard to the provision in regard to vaults.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of temporary quarters for the accommodation of Government officials and moving expenses incident thereto at Winston Salem, N. C., $7,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to make an inquiry about the paragraph on page 22, line 3, being the appropriation for the continuation of the work on the Washington Post Office Building. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is not a fact that the construction of the Post Office Building in Washington is being carried on during Sunday?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information about the matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have passed by there several times on Sunday and have seen the laboring men engaged on that building on Sunday, and I do not know of any other instance in the United States where a contractor is using his force on the Sabbath day in the construction of a Government building. If there is any way to prevent it, I think we ought to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think a contractor would work on a building on Sunday unless it was because of some extraordinary conditions. Work that is done on Sunday costs very much more than a contractor cares to pay. He pays either time and a half or double time to the men employed on Sunday. It might be because of some extraordinary and peculiar condition. I think that would be the only reason that would induce him to do it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I do not know whether my information is authentic or not, but I was told that they had to overcome some very difficult features about the foundation, something in the way of quicksand, or something of that kind, which necessitated an extra amount of work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that at present they are engaged on the excavation work, and the conditions are such that it makes it very important that that part of the work be completed as quickly as possible.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have passed there on several Sundays and, of course, that place is inclosed with a high fence, and you can not tell what the workingmen are doing. Of course, one knows they are working there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the reason is because of the hazardous conditions that result during this period of excavation. It is very expensive for a contractor to do work on Sunday, and unless there is a very peculiar condition there is great difficulty in getting one to do work on Sunday.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and preservation of public buildings: Repairs and preservation of customhouses, courthouses, and post offices, quarantine stations and marine hospitals, buildings and wharf at Sitka, Alaska, buildings not reserved by the vendors on sites acquired for buildings or the enlargement of buildings, and other public buildings and the grounds thereof, including necessary wire screens, under the control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, $625,000: Provided, That of this amount not exceeding $100,000 may be used for marine hospitals and quarantine stations, including wire screens for same, and not exceeding $12,000 for the Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings, at Washington, D. C.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 18, strike out the figures "$625" and insert in lieu thereof "$650."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the estimate is for $650. The reason assigned for an increase of the estimate over the appropriation for the current year is that there are 50 or 60 more buildings to be cared for. It seems to me the increase ought to be given.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply desire to call attention to the fact that for the current fiscal year there was no increase over the appropriation for this item whatever. The appropriation was $600,000 for 1911 and $600,000 for 1912.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but the gentleman is aware that there is an increase of many buildings for this current year and an increase of over 100 buildings to be finished for the coming year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is very true. The Supervising Architect asked $50,000 additional for repairs to public buildings, but because they are new buildings and are coming into commission the committee reached the conclusion that in view of the character of these buildings—that they were new—that it would be practically impossible to spend any money on repairs in that first year if they were properly constructed, and that an increase of $25,000 instead of $50,000 in the appropriation would probably be adequate.

In the estimates for 1911 the Supervising Architect asked for $700,000, although the appropriations for 1900 were $550,000. The committee that year increased the appropriation only $50,000 and refused to give $100,000 of the amount requested. I think that this time the committee has been fairly considerate, in view of the experience we have had, in increasing this appropriation $25,000.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman will notice it is not only the buildings, but the grounds, for the preservation of all the buildings, both the new and old. I simply desired to call the attention of the gentleman to it. We either appropriated too much heretofore or are appropriating too little now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee endeavored to give that sum which would enable the Supervising Architect's Office to exercise some care in keeping these buildings in proper repair.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman should be aware, if he is not, that it frequently happens that the first year's building services requires more repairs than it does five years after, because of the fact the material in the building, doors, window sills, and so forth, shrink and have to be fitted up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and there is another element to be considered. It is very seldom that when a public building is completed the appropriation is entirely exhausted, and those things that are paid the first year are usually charged to the construction account.

Mr. MADDEN. If they are, that is all right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And paid for out of the original appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mechanical equipment for public buildings: For heating, hoisting, plumbing, gas piping, ventilating and refrigerating apparatus, electric-light plants, vacuum-cleaning systems, interior pneumatic-tube, conduit, wiring, call-bell, and signal systems and repairs to the same, for all public buildings, including buildings not reserved by the vendors on sites acquired for buildings or the enlargement of buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, and including not exceeding $40,000 for marine hospitals and quarantine stations, and not exceeding $9,000 for the Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings, at Washington, D. C., and including not exceeding $10,000 for maintenance, changes in and repairs of pneumatic-tube system between the appraiser's warehouse at Greenwich, Christopher, Washington, and Barrow Streets and the new customhouse in Bowling Green, Borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York, including repairs to the street pavement and subsurface necessarily incident to or resulting from such maintenance, changes, or repairs, $440,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the language in line 16, page 24:

Including repairs to the street pavement and subsurface necessarily incident to or resulting from such maintenance and repairs, $440,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain to the gentleman why that language is put in. It is not new. Under the law of the State of New York the city of New York can not grant franchises in perpetuity in the city streets for any purpose. Some years ago the Federal Government desired to construct a pneumatic-tube service between the customhouse in the city of New York——

Mr. MADDEN. And this is to repair that?

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). To the appraisers' stores. This is to repair the street paving when disturbed to repair the tube.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses of public buildings: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to execute and give effect to the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stat., p. 537, pt. 1): For additional salary of $1,000 for the Supervising Architect of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1913, for the specific salaries for the personal services in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, set forth under said office in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1913 (not exceeding $142,920), and for compensation of principal draftsman, foremen draftsmen, architectural draftsmen, and apprentice draftsmen, at rates of pay from $480 to $2,500 per annum; for compensation of structural engineers and draftsmen, at rates of pay from $840 to $2,200 per annum; for compensation of mechanical, sanitary, electrical, heating and ventilating, and illuminating engineers, and draftsmen, at rates of pay from $1,200 to $2,400 per annum; for compensation of computers and estimators, at rates of pay from $1,600 to $2,200 per annum: Provided, That the expenditures for compensation under all the foregoing classes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shall not exceed $317,920; for compensation of supervising superintendents, superintendents, and junior superintendents of construction, at rates of pay from $1,600 to $2,900 per annum, but in no case exceeding $8 per day, Sundays included: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shall not exceed $245,000; for expenses of superintendence, including expenses of all inspectors and other officers and employees on duty or detailed in connection with work on public buildings and the furnishing and equipment thereof under orders from the Treasury Department; office rent and expenses of superintendents, including temporary stenographic and other assistance incident to the preparation of reports and the care of public property, etc.; for cost of advertising; for office supplies, including drafting materials, specially prepared paper, typewriting machines and exchange of same, furniture, carpets, and office equipment, stationery telephone service, and such other articles and supplies as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order or approve for the use of the office of the Supervising Architect, exclusive of heat, light, janitor service, awnings, curtains, or any expenses for the general maintenance of the Treasury Building, but including not exceeding $1,000 for books of reference, technical periodicals, and journals, subscriptions to which may be paid in advance, and also for contingencies of every kind and description, traveling expenses of site agents, recording deeds and other evidences of title, photographic instruments, chemicals, plates, and photographic materials, and such other minor and incidental expenses not enumerated, connected solely with work on public buildings and the acquisition of sites, and the administrative work connected with the annual appropriations under the Supervising Architect's office, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order or approve, not including surveys, plaster models, progress photographs, test pit borings, or mill and shop inspections; in all, for the foregoing objects for general expenses of public buildings, $656,920.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. First I ask unanimous consent to change the spelling of the word "engineers," at the bottom of page 25, line 25.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask what about this language, on page 25, line 15, and so forth, in reference to the specific salaries for personal services carried in the legislative bill. How do you make an appropriation in this bill for services carried in the legislative bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have picked up in the legislative bill salaries which had heretofore been paid out of the lump appropriation aggregating $142,920, and in the preparation of the legislative bill we picked them up; because of certain contemplated rearrangements which it was desired for the improvement of the office the bill did not carry the money to pay them, but it was left to pay them out of the appropriations carried in this bill. Of the appropriation of $659,920, $142,920 is to pay the compensation of places which have now been put upon the statutory rolls in the legislative bill.

Mr. MANN. Why should not the item be carried in the legislative bill? It is a very cumbersome way to carry part of the salaries in one bill and carry part of the salaries in another bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding is, as I recall it, not having the detail information as to the legislative bill as of this one, but, as the legislative subcommittee understood, a certain scheme of reorganization was submitted to the committee in the sundry civil bill. The two bills had to be considered together to determine whether all the recommendations would be adopted before this amount was transferred out of this bill into the other.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember the particular item in the legislative bill. It did not attract my attention. But did we provide in the legislative bill for certain officials, and that that was an appropriation for these items?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was a provision, I am informed, that the compensation of these officials that were taken up in the legislative bill should be paid out of the amount in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt the gentleman is correct. I think there was an item in the legislative bill making salaries to be paid out of a percentage to be taken out of appropriations for public-building bills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. I thought there was an item in the legislative bill to make appropriations for places to be taken out of appropriations for public buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me state to the gentleman what the fact is. The Treasury Department submitted a plan for the segregation of personal services from other work, and a large number of employees who are practically permanent employees are being carried in this lump appropriation. The Treasury Department worked out a scheme that everybody thought was desirable, but that could not be determined until this bill was made up.

Mr. MANN. Is it my understanding that this item carries the appropriation for the Supervising Architect's office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not all of it. The legislative bill——

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking now of that item, but in the main this item in the bill carries the appropriation under which plans for public buildings are prepared and public buildings are erected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. MANN. I notice the item is decreased $150,000 from the current law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The net increase is $31,920. The appropriation for 1912 in this item is $800,000. This carries $656,000, $514,000 to be expended under this language and $142,000 to pay the salaries in the legislative bill; and $175,000, which makes a reduction, is transferred into other items, because it more properly belongs to them.

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to know—whether you are reducing the amount of appropriation for the maintenance of the Supervising Architect's Office.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have in these items given the estimate, and the net increase in this item for the purposes for which this appropriation is made is $31,920.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt the gentleman is right, but he would have to make a chart for reading this paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me call attention to this fact: The following item contains the appropriation for the payment of compensation under the Tarsney Act. In fact, formerly it had been included in this particular item, and the department itself believed it ought to be taken out because it was utterly impossible for them to make an intelligent statement of the expenditures under this item.

Mr. MANN. I will be frank with the gentleman. What I want to ascertain is this: Congress wants to construct some public buildings. The Secretary of the Treasury is not quite as enthusiastic upon the subject as Members of Congress, and I do not know but that I largely agree with the Secretary. The Supervising Architect's Office, which is under the Secretary of the Treasury, has not been very overly enthusiastic, probably because it is controlled by the Secretary. Now, I understand you have given the amount of the estimate practically for this item, but did they reduce the estimate in order to cut down the number of public buildings that can be constructed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we carry more money this year than last.

Mr. MANN. It has been stated here several times that the Secretary of the Treasury arbitrarily directed the Supervising Architect's Office, without any reduction in force, to reduce the number of buildings from 15 a month, as theretofore, to 10 a month hereafter.

Now, I would like to know whether in connection with any such proposition, if that be correct, they have for years proposed to cut off the appropriations for services in the Supervising Architect's Office, so that they could more easily claim hereafter a reduction in the number of buildings? I ask the question because I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury is not in favor of constructing buildings so fast, and that the Supervising Architect's Office has to yield to the Secretary of the Treasury; and I know that the Committee on Appropriations is not in favor of constructing buildings so fast; and hence I would like to know whether, through those forms of legislation that are followed, they have really endeavored to cut off the number of buildings that can be constructed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state to the gentleman that in view of the temper of the House, the House would not tolerate any reduction in the estimate necessary for the conduct of the business of the Supervising Architect's Office at this time, and the committee recommended the appropriation which the Treasury Department submitted for the purpose of conducting the business of the Supervising Architect's Office. Out of this particular appropriation heretofore there have been paid the fees accruing under the Tarsney Act, and the Treasury Department requested us to separate those fees from the other appropriation, so that they could not take money intended to be used when the estimate was made for services in the Supervising Architect's Office and apply it to the payment of fees earned under the Tarsney Act and thus reduce the amount available for use in the Supervising Architect's Office.

Mr. AUSTIN. You did a very wise thing in doing that.

Mr. MANN. My impression was that under the Tarsney Act the fees of the architects were included in the appropriation for the building. I know that was the case when they constructed our building in Chicago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Complaint was made that where it was believed that a certain amount of money was available for a building sometimes large sums were taken out of that fund and paid to the architects. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I believe, reported a bill a few years ago providing that such fees must be appropriated for specifically.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand, then, that to this appropriation of $656,920 there is also to be added this sum of $175,000, making a little more than $800,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. It makes $831,920, more than for the current year.

Mr. AUSTIN. And an increase of $31,000 and something on the outside for these buildings scattered all over the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. COOPER. I have been somewhat interested in the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and that by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], about which they both seemed to agree, that the Secretary of the Treasury was opposed to the construction of certain buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not agree to that statement.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said that the statement was made a number of times on the floor that the Secretary had issued an order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Secretary of the Treasury decided on a building program that would take about $13,000,000 a year. When inquiries were made regarding it by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the Secretary stated that he had arranged the work of the Supervising Architect's Office on that basis, because, in his opinion, the condition of the Government finances would not have justified a larger expenditure in any one year for construction purposes.

Mr. COOPER. Then his opposition did not relate to any particular building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; he has never expressed his opposition to any particular building, I believe, although I could pick out particular buildings which he would be compelled, I think, to admit were perhaps ill advised.

Mr. COOPER. Now that the gentleman is intimating something, I would like to have him continue along that line. What building or buildings does he refer to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he obtain a copy of this document which I printed in the RECORD, which was in reply to several letters from me addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury in January, this year, asking for certain information about various public buildings. He submitted a statement which shows the names of the city, the title of the building, the limit of cost, the population, the postal revenues, the services of the United States which would be accommodated in the building, the annual cost of maintenance of the building when completed, and the present cost of obtaining accommodations in the various communities where the buildings are to be located.

That is a matter upon which each gentleman can draw his own conclusions.

Mr. COOPER. Is that the document from which the information was derived about Sundance?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not. There is no building authorized at Sundance, unless it has been done while I have not been about.

Mr. MANN. The building at Sundance is a dream.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read to and including page 28, line 14.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 4, 1912:

H. R. 16690. An act for the relief of scientific institutions or colleges of learning having violated sections 3297 and 3297a of the Revised Statutes and the regulations thereunder; and

H. R. 16661. An act to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832, and under and by virtue of the treaty between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians of the 9th day of August, 1814.

On June 5, 1912:

H. R. 21478. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 21290. An act to authorize a bridge at or near Council Bluffs, Iowa, approved February 1, 1908, as amended.

On June 6, 1912:

H. R. 20111. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT TURIN, ITALY, IN 1911 (H. DOC. NO. 821).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a statement by the Secretary of State of expenditures on account of the International Exposition at Turin, Italy, in 1911, as required by law.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 7, 1912.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SLAYDEN, for five days, on account of important business.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 8, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 5882) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Yankton, S. Dak., by the Winnipeg, Yankton & Gulf Railroad Co., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 852), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOULD, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22526) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 850), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 851), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Texas, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25109) providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 853), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25106) to incorporate the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 854), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ESCH: A bill (H. SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 8, 1912.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we gratefully acknowledge the Providence which brings us to this day when we commemorate the discovery of this continent. We thank Thee that Thou hast put it into the heart of this people to remember in enduring stone him who, like one of old, went out not knowing whither he went. Our fathers have told us what works Thou didst in the days of old, when they were but few in number and strangers in the land. And now Thou hast increased Thy people mightily and hast strengthened us on every side. Thou hast given us to sow beside many waters in a land that reacheth afar and Thou hast made the desolate spots to be inhabited.

Bless, we pray Thee, the land which Thou hast given unto us. Grant that Salvation may be its walls and bulwarks and that its gates may be Praise. Make Thou our officers Peace and our rulers Righteousness. Extend unto us the peace that floweth as a river, enriching all our borders with honest industry and with honorable toil. Deliver us from invasion from without and from oppression from within. Defend our liberties and uphold our free institutions. Upon the altar of the hearts of this people kindle into living flame the fire of patriotic devotion, that this country may indeed be the land of the free, the home of the brave.

So bless us, we pray Thee, our heavenly Father, and keep us in Thy love and in Thy fear now and for evermore. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS,
New York, N. Y., June 5, 1912.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith a copy of the resolution unanimously adopted at the annual meeting of the members of the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States of America, May 22, 1912.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. S. BOUDINOT, Secretary.

Resolutions adopted by the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States of America in convention assembled May 22, 1912.

Whereas the Department of State and the Department of Commerce and Labor have organized departments for the advancement and promotion of foreign and domestic commerce, and especially for the advancement and promotion of the commerce of the United States in all foreign countries; and

Whereas said departments have been and are of great assistance to the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country in the promotion of foreign relations as well as the strengthening of all commercial and business relations with foreign countries; and

Whereas the necessary appropriations for said departments have heretofore been made by Congress and the organization of said departments continually increased and improved by the use of said appropriations; and

Whereas the House of Representatives has at this time left out of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills the necessary appropriations for the carrying on and advancement of the work heretofore instituted and being carried on by these departments; and

Whereas without such appropriations the said departments will of necessity be discontinued and abolished and the commercial interests of the United States and the advancement of its foreign relations greatly injured and crippled: Therefore be it

Resolved by the National Association of Manufacturers in convention assembled, That the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested and urged to include in its appropriation bills the necessary amounts for the continuation of the work begun by said Departments of State and Commerce and Labor, and that a sufficient sum be appropriated not only to carry on the work as at present being done, but to increase the amount thereof, as well as its efficiency, by such further measures as may be determined as necessary by the departments in charge.

Resolved, That the officers, directors, and members of this association be urged to use their influence with Congress to secure such necessary appropriations, to the end that the foreign commercial interests of the United States be extended and upheld and the interests of the members of this association, as well as other manufacturers and commercial interests in this country, be assisted, extended, and conserved by the Government of the United States, and that its prestige as a commercial Nation be increased and maintained throughout the world, that it may take its proper place among other commercial nations.

A true copy.

[SEAL.] GEO. S. BOUDINOT, Secretary.

M'CLELLAN PARK.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 2845) to acquire certain land in Washington Heights for a public park to be known as McClellan Park, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 865) thereon.

PORT OF BAY CITY, MICH.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably the bill (H. R. 17679) to make Bay City, Mich., a subport of entry, and I submit a report (No. 863) thereon. It is a unanimous report, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALIFORNIA REDWOOD PARK.

Mr. WORKS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 19476) granting certain lands to the State of California to form a part of California Redwood Park, in said State, and I submit a report (No. 864) thereon. It is a very short bill and of local interest. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAUSATION AND PREVENTION OF TYPHOID FEVER.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I report back House concurrent resolution 43 with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That there be printed 50,000 copies of Public Health Bulletin No. 51, with illustrations, entitled "The Causation and Prevention of Typhoid Fever"; 35,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 15,000 for the use of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE. I submit an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for a fish hatchery at Woods Hole, Mass., which I intend to offer to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069).

I ask that it be referred with the accompanying letter to the Committee on Appropriations. The letter need not be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will not be printed, but will be referred with the amendment to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 for overhauling and making necessary repairs to the steamer Albatross, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment authorizing the setting aside of a homestead of 80 acres or more from the homestead allotment or surplus allotment of citizens of the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians whose quantum of Indian blood is three-quarters or more, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 26728), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make per capita payments of such sums as he may deem advisable to the tribal fund of the Seminole, Cherokee, Choctaw, and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians to the enrolled members entitled thereto, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 20728), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, to lie on the table.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 6795) to control the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 21226) relating to compensation of clerks of United States district courts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ESTHER E. STUCKY.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 6260) granting a pension to Esther E. Stucky be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

HALL-GARRISON & CO. V. THE REPUBLIC OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 336), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit to the Senate all documents and correspondence or copies of documents on file in his office or in or under his possession relating to the claim of Hall-Garrison & Co. v. The Republic of Nicaragua.

WOOLSEY TELLER V. THE REPUBLIC OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 337), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit to the Senate all documents and correspondence or copies of documents on file in his office or in or under his possession relating to the claim of the late Woolsey Teller v. The Republic of Nicaragua.

USE OF ARMY AND NAVY IN FOREIGN TERRITORY.

Mr. BACON. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 334) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, except in the case of sudden emergency requiring prompt and immediate action for the protection of the lives and property of citizens of the United States, there is no authority for the use of the Army or Navy of the United States in any military operations within the territory of any foreign nation unless the same is expressly authorized and directed by act of Congress.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to examine and report to the Senate what conditions or circumstances will constitute such conditions of emergency as will justify the use of the Army or Navy of the United States in the prosecution of military operations within the territory of a foreign nation in the absence of such express authority from Congress, and to report what legislation, if any, is required to definitely provide and prescribe when such military operations may be lawfully thus prosecuted in foreign territory without express authorization by Congress.

Resolved further, That the committee be directed to examine and report what law, if any, now exists authorizing the use of the Army or Navy of the United States in military operations in the territory of any foreign nation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before moving the reference of the resolution I simply desire to say, in order that the introduction of it may not be misunderstood, that I am not opposed to the use of the Army and Navy for any legitimate purpose or for any required purpose. I am not opposed to granting whatever authority or power there may be in order that the Army and Navy may be so used whenever circumstances or the public interest requires it.

The introduction of this resolution simply indicates, so far as my personal attitude is concerned, my unalterable opposition to the assumption of the authority of any officer to the use of the Army and Navy except where authorized by law. This is, or should be, a government of laws and not of men. Whatever law is required should be passed to meet the requirement, but nothing should be done unless authorized by law.

It is not necessary to be more explicit than that. The papers are filled to-day with reports of fleets and armies about to be moved to a foreign country, and no word said to Congress regarding it. We now have some portion of the Army and Navy in foreign territory without any authorization of Congress, some of it in China and elsewhere. A year or two ago we saw two transports loaded with troops and sent to Central America without authority of law. It is a matter which requires, in my opinion, action on the part of Congress clearly to define under what circumstances the Army and Navy of the United States can be used in foreign territory and under what circumstances it can not be properly and lawfully so used, and to clearly vest with authority, wherever it is important that it be done, the proper officer to use it in the cases where it may be required.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Georgia to intend——

Mr. BACON. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM. I understood that the Senator intended to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BACON. I said when I began that I intended to ask that the resolution be so referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

INCITEMENT OF INSURRECTION IN CUBA AND MEXICO.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it may be read. I shall move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations after making a very brief statement in regard to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Minnesota will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 335), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to inquire, investigate, ascertain, and report whether any persons, associations, corporations, or other interests in the United States have heretofore been or are now engaged in fomenting, inciting, encouraging, or financing rebellion, insurrection, or other flagrant disorder in Cuba and Mexico, against the lawful organized governments of those countries;

Resolved further, That said committee, or a subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to summon witnesses, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take and secure whatever testimony and evidence may be required to ascertain and report upon the matters aforesaid; and said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized for the purposes aforesaid to sit and act as well when Congress is not in session as when in session:

Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby directed to report the result of its said investigation and inquiry to the Senate during the first month of the next session of Congress; and the expenses incurred by such investigation and inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement before moving to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

For some years I have been impressed with the idea that the recurring troubles in Cuba and in Mexico had their origin in this country. I believe, to speak plainly, that the people who are interested in sugar plantations and who have other great interests in Cuba are to a large extent instrumental in stirring up the frequent troubles in that country. Their evident purpose is to create such a condition there that they can move for the annexation of Cuba to the United States, and thus get rid of the 80 per cent of the sugar duty which they are now paying on the product of their sugar plantations.

You will remember, Mr. President, that in the Spanish treaty of Paris provision was made for the liquidation and adjustment of a large number of claims. It turned out that the commission appointed for that purpose had passed upon those claims and allowed a small portion of them; but, if Senators will recall the facts, they will remember that most of those claims were preferred by Cubans naturalized, men who owned sugar plantations and other property in Cuba, who had moved to this country and become naturalized so as to claim the immunities and privileges of American citizenship in respect to their property in Cuba. I repeat, most of those claims were preferred by such men, and it is a matter of history that to a large extent those same gentlemen financed the insurrection that prevailed for many years in Cuba.

The same thing, Mr. President, to my mind, has heretofore happened and is now occurring in Mexico. The mining interests of that country, the great mining corporations and the mining promoters, have found, in many instances, valuable mineral resources in northwestern Mexico, in the country bordering on New Mexico, Arizona, and California. Copper, oil, silver, gold, and other minerals are there in abundance. The people interested in these properties are very anxious to have that territory annexed to the United States. In fact, I know this from my own knowledge, for some of those gentlemen have expressed the idea to me, that there are portions of Mexico that ought to be a part of the United States.

I have been impressed with the idea that, both in the case of Mexico and in the case of Cuba, these disturbances, insurrections, and rebellions are inspired and to a large extent financed in the United States. How easy it is among some of the leaders in eastern Cuba, where the population is of a mixed character, to furnish a little money for those leaders among the mulattoes—the colored people—to finance them to some extent so as to enable them to gather a crowd of men around them, to burn a few cane mills, to destroy a few plantations, and then to raise a hue and cry that peace and order can not be maintained in Cuba and therefore it is necessary to annex it to the United States.

I remember an incident that occurred some years ago during a disturbance which had arisen prior to the time when we last took charge of the Cuban Government. The editor of a large western paper sent me a telegram before we sent our troops down there, asking whether I did not think the only solution was to annex Cuba. I replied that I did not think that was the solution, but that the solution was to stop our own people from creating, building up, and financing disturbances. That paper never published my answer; and from that day to this it has treated me with a frigidity that would indicate the proximity of an iceberg. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Minnesota pardon me for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Gladly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will remember that I called the attention of the Senate a week or two ago to the matter by the introduction of a resolution in reference to Cuba. Since then I have had a dozen letters from people who have property in Cuba urging that the only thing to do is to annex the island.

Mr. NELSON. Now we are asked to send troops down there. To get at the root of this whole matter, let us ascertain who is at the bottom of these disturbances, where they have their origin, who finance them, and who bring them about? Then we shall know how to deal with the situation. For that reason I have introduced this resolution. I trust the Committee on Foreign Relations will approve of the idea and that the resolution may be reported favorably and then go to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE COMMERCE COURT.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to call up the motion, notice of which was given yesterday, to discharge the Committee on Interstate Commerce from the further consideration of Senate bill 3297, which has as its aim and purpose the abolishment of the Commerce Court by way of an amendment to the act to create the Commerce Court, approved June 18, 1910.

Mr. President, I make this motion at this time because the consideration of the question necessarily will be involved in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which is now before the Senate. The House of Representatives in passing that bill failed to make any appropriation for the Commerce Court. The Senate committee in considering the bill amended it by making an appropriation for the Commerce Court.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. The House went further than stated by the Senator. It abolished the court absolutely in express terms, in addition to failing to make an appropriation for it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator turn to the portion of the bill containing that provision? My recollection is that it only recommended the abolishment of the court.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that section 10 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill reads as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Commerce Court is abolished on and after July 1, 1912, and all laws in so far as they provide for the establishment of said Commerce Court are repealed. The jurisdiction now vested in the Commerce Court is hereby transferred to and vested in the district courts of the United States. All cases pending in the Commerce Court at the date of the passage of this act shall be transferred forthwith to said district courts. Each of said cases shall be transferred to the district court wherein it might have been filed at the time it was filed in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect, and if it might have been filed in any one of two or more district courts it shall be transferred to that one of said district courts which may be designated by the petitioner or petitioners in said case; or, upon failure of said petitioners to act in the premises within 10 days after the passage of this act, to such one of said district courts as may be designated by the judges of the Commerce Court. The judges of the Commerce Court shall have authority, and are hereby directed, to make any and all orders and to take any other action necessary to transfer as aforesaid the cases then pending in the Commerce Court to said district courts.

The Senator will find that on page 157 of the bill. There are several provisions. The House failed in one place to make the appropriation, and then they put a clause in the bill that hereafter no circuit judge shall be appointed until the number is reduced to 29, and then there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges; and then section 10 abolishes the Commerce Court entirely.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad the Senator has called my attention to that fact; but it makes all the more evident the advisability of discharging the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce from the consideration of the very matter which the Senate will have to consider in connection with the pending appropriation bill. Many Senators object to considering a matter of substantive legislation on an appropriation bill, especially when that substantive matter has been referred to a committee which has not reported upon it. The bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce more than six months ago. It is a matter of current and pressing importance, and the Senate is entitled to action upon it. What the particular conditions were in the committee which have brought about the failure of the committee to act, I do not know; but it is perfectly evident that the committee will not make a report upon this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I was one of the minority of the committee who favored the House provision abolishing the Commerce Court. While, as a general rule, I am not in favor of legislating upon an appropriation bill, it seems to me that the time has now come when this matter should be disposed of in connection with the appropriation bill. If the bill now in the hands of the Committee on Interstate Commerce is reported, it will have to run the gamut of the Senate, then go to the House of Representatives, and there be discussed. In the pending appropriation bill this very question has been discussed in the House of Representatives and is here for discussion now. It seems to me, after the decision made by the Supreme Court yesterday, in which they say this is nothing but a quasi court anyway, we had better abolish the court here and now in the appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator; and it is in order to clear the way so that it will not be involved by extraneous issues that I make the motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of this subject, so that it may be before the Senate without hindrance for consideration when this portion of the appropriation bill will be reached, which will be in a very short time. It may be the intention to go on with it to-day.

The Commerce Court was created notwithstanding the predictions that it would blanket the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the record of the court since its creation has verified all of those predictions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. In referring to the Commerce Court as a quasi court, I will say that I got my information merely from the newspapers. I have gone to the Supreme Court to get a copy of the decision which I had in mind, but have not been able to get it, as it is not yet printed. Therefore, I do not know exactly the terms of the decision, and only gathered my information from reading the newspapers. So that my statement to the effect that the Supreme Court had decided that the Commerce Court was a quasi court was not quoted from the decision of the court itself, for I do not know whether or not the court used that language.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The decision will not be printed until some time next week, but I am reliably informed that every case that has been appealed from the Commerce Court to the Supreme Court has been reversed. Heretofore one decision reversing the Commerce Court by the Supreme Court has been rendered, and on yesterday a number of other cases coming up from the Commerce Court were decided, every one of them adversely to the Commerce Court.

Whether or not the Supreme Court says that the Commerce Court is a quasi court, it remains that it is only an experimental court; and that it is a dangerous experiment is proved by the results. I think that the record of the court is a matter of secondary importance to the general conditions involved by the existence of such a court. The decisions that have been rendered by this court, which are so bad that every one of them has been reversed by the Supreme Court, have created an intense feeling on the subject throughout the country, and are evidence that the existence of a special tribunal created to deal especially with matters of railroad transportation and interstate commerce has necessarily, and in the nature of things, tended to bring about that condition of affairs.

I do not care, Mr. President, to speak at length upon this subject at the present time, but I want to state briefly what the conditions are. My contention is that it is perfectly useless, in the first place, to say nothing of the positive injury to the public regulation of interstate commerce, to have two specially created tribunals to deal with that subject. One is necessarily bound to blanket the other. The Commerce Court, as was predicted in the debates when the bill providing for it was before the Senate, having no other jurisdiction except over interstate commerce and having ample time and being in the nature of things disposed to justify its existence, would naturally tend toward expanding its jurisdiction. It naturally would be jealous of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In the very nature of things a situation is created in which there is rivalry between these two tribunals. The Commerce Court, of course, being the appellate tribunal, claims a superiority over the Interstate Commerce Commission. It tends to enlarge its jurisdiction, and has actually enlarged it in the practice before it and in the decisions which it has rendered.

The consequence is that the usefulness, the power, and the effectiveness of the Interstate Commerce Commission are to a corresponding degree lessened. If the Commerce Court is to continue in the course on which the present court has started, the usefulness of the Interstate Commerce Commission will be destroyed. We might as well abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission if we are going to retain the Commerce Court.

Not only has the Commerce Court undertaken to review judicial matters which were decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but it has undertaken to review and has reviewed legislative matters which were decided or administered by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I believe the decisions which have been rendered by this court are a perfectly natural outcome of the situation created by the existence of these two rival tribunals. That situation brings about the absolute destruction of any effective results from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This experiment has been tried. It is but a brief time since the tribunal was established, and see the trouble and the dissatisfaction that have been created in that brief time. Public resentment has been aroused by the decisions of the court. Every decision it has rendered that has been taken up to the Supreme Court has been reversed. Attacks have been made upon the integrity of the judges of the court, and one of them is now threatened with impeachment.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator says this court has undertaken to review not only legal but legislative questions. Has it not also assumed to determine the very questions of fact that have been decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has.

Mr. WORKS. Thus constituting itself practically a trial court de novo of all of the things that were tried in the lower tribunal?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has. It has done so notwithstanding the limitations that were placed by law upon the power of review of the court over the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I make the assertion that the Commerce Court has stricken down every limitation upon its power of review, has claimed to have and has exercised an unlimited right of review, both as to law and as to fact, both as to judicial questions and as to legislative questions, which have been passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The law, as it was construed by the Supreme Court of the United States prior to the creation of the Commerce Court, limited the appellate powers of the courts to cases in which there had been an abuse of discretion or an excess of authority on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As I remember, when that court was established it was predicted that it would expedite matters, and that there would be a more speedy disposition of questions arising in relation to differences between shippers and railroads. As a matter of fact, has it not had the opposite effect and hung up in litigation matters that could have been decided more speedily without it, because of the fact that an appeal lies from its decisions to the Supreme Court of the United States and it is an intermediary court that may stand as an instrument of delay rather than tending to expedite decisions?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It undoubtedly has, Mr. President. There have been a number of tables published, notably those presented by the Attorney General in the hearings before the House committee which was considering the bill to abolish the Commerce Court, which tables purported to show that business had been expedited. They did show that the Commerce Court had acted expeditiously, perhaps more expeditiously than the circuit courts had acted before the Commerce Court was created. But the result of this action was not to conclude the litigation, but to continue it, to tie it up in the courts.

A remarkable condition exists, and I say that it is not only due to the personnel of the court, to the unfortunate apparent leanings of the judges of the court in favor of the railroads, but due to the conditions and to the rivalry between the court and the commission. Out of 13 applications for temporary injunctions of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, temporary injunctions were granted in 8 cases; and of the remaining cases in which application had been made and temporary injunctions were not granted only 1 was a case in which the railroad company applied for a restraining order. The other cases in which the Commerce Court refused to grant temporary orders to restrain the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission were applications by the shippers, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission had decided against the shippers and in favor of the railroad companies. This illustrates the tendency of the Commerce Court, whatever it may be due to—whether it is due to improper motives, or whatever it may be due to—to decide in favor of the railroad companies the cases that are before it.

I want briefly, now, to call attention to the revolution in the law that has been made by the Commerce Court limiting the right of appeal and the right of review from the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Referring to what are called the water-carrier cases, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its report, at page 55, said:

> The matter is called to the attention of Congress, because if the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the case has been taken by appeal, should sustain the holding of the Commerce Court additional legislation would be required if the authority of this commission over the accounts of common carriers is to be of the same value in the future as in the past.

There was a case in which the Commerce Court undertook to change the law, reducing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, denying them powers which had previously existed. And I am very glad to say that when the case went before the Supreme Court it did reverse the court's decision, and sustained the law as it had existed before the creation of the Commerce Court.

But the fact that the shippers have a remedy by appeal to the Supreme Court, and that they are so fortunate that the Supreme Court has upheld the law, furnishes no adequate reason for the continuance of the Commerce Court. People ought not to be put to the expense, litigation ought not to be subjected to the delay, that is involved in trying these cases through an unnecessary tribunal and then taking an appeal from the erroneous, partial decisions of that tribunal, through the long course to the final judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The question of expense which is involved in the appropriation bill, leaving out an appropriation for this court, is a mere bagatelle compared with the principles involved. But in considering the question of expense, what justification or what sense could there be in creating a court requiring the expenditure of money by the Government unless there were some good results that, at least, could be probably or possibly obtained by the creation of that tribunal?

We do not need it. In the year prior to the creation of this court not a single order of the Interstate Commerce Commission had been interfered with by the circuit courts. The Interstate Commerce Commission has established its reputation and gained the confidence which it now has in public opinion and in the opinion of the Government, and of everybody who has given any attention to the matter, by the care which it has exercised in disposing of the questions which have come before it. It has devoted years of patient investigation to particular questions of rates involved in the litigation—if it may be called litigation—which was brought before it.

In one case that I have in mind, for some six or seven years the case was pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission. They were so careful, when objections were made by the railroads to the final decision which they had reached, that they ordered that the plan they proposed should be tentatively put into effect, to determine by actual trial in the business of the railroads whether the railroads would be subject to the loss that they claimed they would be subject to if the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission went into effect.

This was in the intermountain cases. It was found, as was predicted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that they would not be subject to such loss; that while the course proposed would do justice to communities that were suffering from rank discriminations by the railroads, the railroads would not suffer the loss they claimed they would sustain if deprived of what I consider the monstrous power of determining what cities shall have business and what cities shall not have business; of dividing the country up into zones, which the railroads say no government ought to have the power to do, and yet which they assume power to do, giving to one zone certain advantages and denying them to others. The commission found that depriving the railroads of that arbitrary and monstrous power would not subject the railroads to the loss which they claimed they would be subjected to, and they found it by actual trial of the schedules which they proposed as adapted to the actual business of the railroads.

What did the Commerce Court do? After all of that careful investigation and consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission the court entered an order, without investigation and without expert knowledge, restraining the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission and tying it up for an indefinite period. When a decision will be reached no man can tell. The people who are interested may be dead and in their graves before this question, which has been fought out for years before the Interstate Commerce Commission, will finally reach a decision in the Supreme Court of the United States, after going its long intermediate course through the Commerce Court.

The existence of this special court, holding its sessions in the city of Washington, trying its cases in the city of Washington, instead of trying them as they had been tried before—in the localities where the parties, particularly the shippers, resided—tends to invite the railroad companies to litigate the issues in which they are interested. It tends to invite the railroad companies to take appeals from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Commerce Court which previously they were not disposed to take. A special court, devoted exclusively to that class of litigation, gives the railroad companies the opportunity—which we all know they exercise, and it is perfectly natural that they should—to use their great and powerful influence to affect the character of judges who are appointed to that court. That is one of the vices of a special court of this kind. Of course, if it were necessary we would have to subject ourselves to that condition. But, not being necessary, it seems to me to be the utmost folly to create a court which simply invites and gives an opportunity to the great interests that are involved to concentrate their attention upon this particular spot where the exclusive jurisdiction over commerce questions is vested.

I want to call attention to another instance in which the Commerce Court has set aside the law and established a power which did not exist before it was created, and which the Senate and the House tried to limit by saying expressly that it should have no more power than the circuit courts had before the Commerce Court was created.

In regard to what are called the Pacific coast switching cases, the Interstate Commerce Commission, after having carefully reviewed the cases and pointed out the circumstances involved, make this statement—and it is very pertinent in view of the question asked a moment ago by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]:

> If the Commerce Court is correct in stating that where the facts are admitted, it is for that court to determine whether the rate is unreasonable or the discrimination undue, then ninety-nine one-hundredths of the orders of this commission can be reviewed upon the question of fact by the courts.

That is the view which the Interstate Commerce Commission takes of the authority exercised by the Commerce Court—that if the position they have taken is sustained ninety-nine one-hundredths of the orders of the commission can be reviewed upon questions of fact by the courts.

The Interstate Commerce Commission in their report also call special attention to what I adverted to a moment ago—the remarkable circumstance that in the cases in which the Commerce Court sustained the commission the decisions were also in favor of the railroads, just as their decisions were in favor of the railroads when they reversed the commission. They found in favor of the railroads practically all the time, although part of the time they reversed the commission and part of the time they sustained the commission. Whichever was necessary in order to decide in favor of the railroad companies the record shows they did.

The Interstate Commerce Commission says:

> We call especial attention to these last two cases for the purpose of showing the manner in which the orders of the commission are being reviewed. The Supreme Court has declared that the making of a transportation rate for the future is a legislative and not a judicial function. It has further apparently declared that this function may be exercised by Congress through the appointment of a commission acting under rules prescribed by it. The rate when fixed is just as much legislative when made by a commission as when made directly by the legislature itself.
> That being so, the discretionary power involved in reaching the conclusion that a particular rate is or is not reasonable for the future, or that a particular discrimination is or is not undue, is a legislative discretion which can not be reviewed by the courts.
> How is the exercise of this judgment in prescribing the future rate any the less legislative because there happens to be no dispute about the facts to which it is applied? Or how, if the conclusion of fact reached by this commission can not be reviewed through judicial process, can a court look into the mind of the commission for the purpose of determining whether that conclusion has been influenced by any improper motive or consideration?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for the purpose of making a statement as to the attitude of the committee, or at least my personal attitude, toward the Senator's motion?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in regard to the Interstate Commerce Committee, on the 15th of November it took up hearings upon the question of possible trust legislation. It has taken a great deal of testimony and has not yet perfected a report. Later I shall present to the Senate some observations with reference to the work of the committee in regard to that subject. That is one of the reasons why this and other pending legislation has not yet received the action of the Committee.

Now, in regard to the motion of the Senator from Washington, when the bill was before the Senate to establish the Commerce Court I opposed it as strongly as I knew how and urged fundamental objections to it, which, of course, at that time were necessarily somewhat speculative as to experience, because we had not yet tried the court; but the experience with the court has demonstrated the absolute soundness of every objection that was urged to the establishment of the court.

The House in the pending bill, known as the legislative, and so forth, appropriation bill, has inserted a clause to abolish the court, and I of course would vote to sustain the House in that action. If the action of the House was sustained and the court was abolished, that, of course, would automatically divest the committee of any further jurisdiction of the subject. Consequently being prepared personally to vote to sustain the House action, which would of necessity divest the committee of any jurisdiction, I have no objection personally to the motion of the Senator to discharge the committee, and bring the matter before the Senate, that the whole matter may be before the Senate both in the Senator's bill and in the action of the House. I not only have no objection to it, but I would vote to produce that result.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the chairman of the committee for stating his position. In view of the fact that a number of notices, I believe, are pending of speeches to-day, I will conclude what I have to say at this time on this motion and finish any further remarks that I may have at the time that the section in the legislative appropriation bill which involves this question is reached.

I want to call attention to the statement which, upon a careful examination of the records of the Commerce Court, is made by the Interstate Commerce Commission:

> Out of 27 cases passed on by the Commerce Court, preliminary restraining orders or final decrees have been issued in favor of the railroads in all but 7 cases—

That is, but seven that they did not decide in favor of the railroads—> and of these only three are of any magnitude. In saying that the court has ruled in favor of the railroads we do not mean that the ruling has been always adverse to the commission, but it has been adverse to the shippers' contention. For instance, the court decided in favor of the commission in the two Cincinnati rate cases. These were proceedings in which the shippers of Cincinnati sought to have the commission ordered to reopen a case and fix a lower scale of rates to Chattanooga than had been ordered, on the ground that the rates fixed by the commission were unreasonably high and had been based upon considerations which the commission should not have regarded, namely, competition from the East and the West. In these cases the court held that it had no right to review the findings of the commission.

Again, in the Procter & Gamble case, involving the right of a carrier to impose demurrage on a private car standing on a private track, the commission was sustained, its view being that for which the railroad also contended.

In but three cases of any consequence where the commission and the shippers have been opposed to the railroads have the orders of the commission been sustained even temporarily by the refusal to grant a temporary restraining order. These cases were the Meeker case, the Salt Lake case, and the Omaha lumber case.

I want to call attention also to a paragraph from the debate in this body at the time this court was created in order to show the exact parallel between the results actually obtained and the results which were predicted by those who had given attention to the subject at that time.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] made this statement:

That court under existing conditions will not have sufficient business, unless it entertains cases that would not now be entertained by the circuit courts of the United States. It is true that the bill as originally introduced gave the Commerce Court a jurisdiction in matters of merger, etc., with reference to stock and bond issues, which might have absorbed a portion of its time, but all those provisions being eliminated from the bill, the court is now simply called upon to exercise the jurisdiction hitherto exercised by the circuit courts of the United States. Only a few cases have arisen within the last three or four years, I believe, that would come within the jurisdiction of the court, and it can not be claimed that that court can have business unless it welcomes and harbors suits which would not be entertained by the United States circuit courts.

That prediction is absolutely verified by the consideration that for a year previous to the creation of this court not an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission had been interfered with by any court, and that within six months after it began to operate it interfered with 20 out of 27 orders made by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Senator from Nevada proceeded to say:

The aim of our legislation should be to make the commission an administrative tribunal of great character, dignity, and power, and not to establish near it an overshadowing judicial tribunal whose only function is to review its orders and restrain their enforcement, and whose only hope of sufficient work to justify the continuation and maintenance of its life will depend on welcoming the suits to restrain the enforcement of the commission's orders.

Now, Mr. President, with that citation I will postpone the further consideration of this motion with the simple statement that it involves the entire question of rate regulation in the United States, than which there is no more important subject. The statement is made upon reliable authority that the taxes, if we may call them that, collected by the railroad companies for services which they render amount to more than the expense of conducting the Federal Government, of all the State governments, and of all the municipal governments in this country.

This Commerce Court was created as a portion of a reactionary railroad measure as it was originally framed and introduced. I say that, for one reason, because it contained a clause in direct contravention of the public policy which was in favor at the time, that railroad mergers should not be allowed.

The bill as it was introduced, containing in one of its clauses the Commerce Court, made a provision for railroad mergers, which, though nominally limited, in effect would have been unlimited, and created a tribunal which would provide the means for competing lines to merge. The argument in favor of it was that we had not been able, notwithstanding the law, to prevent mergers, and the astonishing conclusion was drawn that because the law had not been enforced we should surrender the law, and the railroads might have legal provision to make mergers—in order to put them on a legal basis.

The most astonishing monopoly which confronts us to-day is the monopoly of transportation. It has been in my observation in different parts of the country that there is no competition too small to escape its attention; and where in a small way a little competitive company attempts to establish itself by putting on a boat or building a trolley line, to do even the local business in competition with a great railroad system, at once all the power of the great railroad system is used to put its small rival out of business. And its methods are not by any means always lawful. It is known that in many cases boats have been destroyed, and charges were made at least that they were intentionally destroyed. This monopoly and its methods are involved vitally in the question whether or not we are to continue in effect this unnecessary tribunal—not only unnecessary, as shown by this record, but absolutely destructive of the means which we have developed through 20 long years of effort, largely exercised through the Interstate Commerce Commission—to bring the power of the Government into operation to prevent these discriminations and injustices.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, although I am a member of the committee to which this bill was referred and which now has it in charge I am heartily in favor of the motion and hope it will prevail.

I was opposed to the creation of the Commerce Court for the reasons which I gave the Senate at the time the bill was under debate. I am in favor of the abolition of the court for the same reasons. I deeply regret that the question will reach the Senate in an appropriation bill. I do not believe in legislation of that character in appropriation bills. I do not say that I will not vote for this part of the appropriation bill, but I should infinitely rather vote for the abolition of the court upon an independent measure such as has been presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

I want therefore the bill which he has introduced to be before the Senate at the time we will consider this part of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill in order to see whether there is not some way in which we can legislate upon the subject without incurring the criticism of imposing such legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Therefore, it seems to me that every consideration favors the adoption of the motion and the bringing of the subject before the Senate in the way in which it ought to be brought before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I only want to say one or two words that I think are pertinent to this matter at present.

Under the recent decision of the Supreme Court, as I interpret it, practically all that is left of the courts to decide are two questions. The first is whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has kept within the pale of the law of its creation—in other words, whether it had the legislative power to do what it has done. The other question, which is the important one, is whether it has violated any principle of the Constitution. Has it in the constitutional sense invaded private rights? Under the act of 1891 establishing the Court of Appeals questions relating to constitutional law can be brought directly to the Supreme Court; other questions go to the Court of Appeals.

This Court of Commerce, as it exists to-day, under the recent decisions of the Supreme Court can try a case de novo upon the facts. It is really an appellate court upon pure questions of statutory law and constitutional law.

It seems to me that there is no warrant for the existence of such a court; that an appeal from the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to go directly to the court of appeals, and where it is a matter of constitutional law the case ought to go directly to the Supreme Court. Therefore, it appears to me, aside from all other questions, that there is no warrant for the existence of this tribunal in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court, limited as the court has properly limited it.

In this connection it is curious to note that out of the seven cases in which they granted temporary or preliminary injunctions one case was reversed by the Supreme Court some time ago, I do not recall just how long, and I believe five cases yesterday, making six in all out of the seven cases in which they granted a temporary injunction.

In fact, Mr. President, and I say this in a Christian spirit, the record is such that instead of calling this a Commerce Court you could call it an injunction court.

For the reasons I have stated I think there is no warrant for the existence of this court. I was not favorable to the idea of the court in the first instance, but the proposition was involved among other provisions of the act that we passed to increase the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We all know that in matters of legislation it is a matter of compromise, a matter of give and take, and in order to get through important legislation placed in that bill, against my own better judgment and for the time being, I acquiesced in the creation of this court. But I felt then, and that feeling has recently been emphasized, that it ought never to have been created, and that whatever jurisdiction we have given to that court, instead of being given to the district courts, ought now to be delegated, in the first instance, to the court of appeals to pass upon questions of law, and in constitutional questions directly to the Supreme Court. That would make it in harmony with the court of appeals act of 1891.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I can not refrain from saying that I have no change of mind in regard to this court. When it was proposed I opposed it with all the vigor and power that I possessed. I am sorry to say it was not sufficient to accomplish its defeat at that time. I was utterly and unqualifiedly opposed to it then, and I am in favor of its utter and unqualified repeal now. I will vote for its repeal in the first shape in which it comes before us, whether it is in an appropriation bill or in an independent bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I had grave doubt about the constitutionality of the act which established this court. That doubt, however, did not arise out of any question as to the power of Congress to create a special court of this kind, but was due to the peculiar provisions of that act. It seemed to me very questionable if Congress could require a judge appointed to one judicial office to perform the duties of another and a different office, and therefore I did not vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BACON. And the Senator from Texas will also remember that I based it on that specific ground.

Mr. BAILEY. It was the argument of the Senator from Georgia which first raised in my mind the doubt. When he first began to talk with me on the subject I did not agree with him, but upon an examination of the peculiar provisions of it I thought its constitutionality so doubtful that I refrained from voting on the bill containing it. But this court has now been in existence for some time, and, as I understand, its constitutionality has not been challenged. It has proceeded, without question, to discharge the duties imposed upon it, and I take it that my doubts in that regard were not well founded. Except for that doubt I should have favored the organization of this court in the beginning, and as I intend to vote, or would vote, except for the pair which prevents my voting at all, against repealing the law which created it, perhaps I ought to state briefly my reasons for favoring it.

Generally I am averse to special tribunals, because a judge who is a specialist is seldom a great judge; and he is often not even a good judge, because the inevitable tendency of devoting a man's mind to one question is to narrow it and to lose that broader culture which many and varied questions cultivate; but, Mr. President, there are particular questions, so intricate and so peculiar in their nature, that no man whose time is given over to a consideration of many and general subjects will ever be able to completely master. When the Government itself assumes to compel the performance of a specific duty, I am rather inclined to believe that a special court is a competent and desirable instrument for that purpose. For instance, I supported a bill creating a special customs court, because I know, as does every other Senator who has ever had anything to do with the construction of a tariff bill, that it is almost impossible for a judge, who is performing various other duties, to decide those questions speedily and correctly. I would cheerfully vote to create a patent court, because any lawyer who has ever undertaken to try a patent case or to advise a client upon a patent case knows that it is almost like putting a professor of mathematics to teaching Latin or Greek. I do not care how excellent his general scholarship may be, he can only do a special work by a special equipment for it. I would in the old time undoubtedly have supported the bill to create a court of private land claims, because, like the Customs Court or the patent court, it deals with a concession by the Government or a particular relation to the Government. That exact relation, I grant you, does not exist with reference to the Commerce Court, but I am safe in saying that when we assume that it takes a large number of very capable men, devoting themselves exclusively to the subject of regulating the railroads, we are not very far afield when we say that a judge, with a hundred other cases on his docket to try in a single term, will not be very well able to try this case involving the intricacies of a thousand related railroad charges. I am of the opinion that the best way to secure a prompt, as well as a wise, settlement of these controversies is to commit them to a tribunal which has nothing else to do.

Mr. President, they tell me, and that is true, that under the law if they come into the court with one of these cases it must be advanced on the docket, and the judge must give it precedence over all other business in his court. That undoubtedly provides in a way for an expeditious settlement of the controversy; but while the court is occupying itself for days or even for weeks, and, in some cases, it might be for an entire term, with the settlement of this lawsuit, all other litigants in that court must wait. The delay which thus inevitably ensues to the individual suitor in these courts is a matter of grave concern to him. No man ought to be compelled to wait beyond a reasonable time for the disposition of his case, unless some great public interest renders it unavoidable.

But, Mr. President, if there were no other reasons I could not vote for this proposition, because it is a sort of legislative recall of this court. That is precisely what it is, and that is precisely what it is intended to be. Some Senators, and others who have not taken the trouble to examine these decisions, are not satisfied with them, and they proceed to recall the court. If, when the court does not please the Senate, we can repeal the law which created it, we shall have precious little right to complain of those gospelers of riot and disorder who now are proposing not only to recall the courts, but to overrule the decisions of courts by plebiscite. We shall make the proposition of an ex-President eminently respectable and conservative if we go to the extent of repealing the law which created this court, because, forsooth, we do not happen to like some of its decisions.

Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota complains that this court has granted six preliminary injunctions. To my mind, that is a just criticism against it; but there is a way to obviate that criticism without repealing the law which created the court. Some six years ago I had the honor to propose in this Chamber an amendment to the interstate-commerce bill, which then was pending here. I proposed in that amendment to prohibit by express terms the issuance of a preliminary injunction; but on that vote more than two-thirds of the Senate rejected my proposition. After having rejected a conservative proposal under which the judges of the Commerce Court and no other judges in this country could restrain an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission until they inquired into the wisdom and justice of it, now the very much more radical proposition is made that because the court issued injunctions we will abolish it.

I believed then, Mr. President, and I believe now, that nothing could be more absurd than that this Government should create a tribunal, clothe it with certain faculties, impose upon it great and important duties, fill that tribunal with men of high character and great ability, fix a tenure in that office longer than that which Senators enjoy, and then, after such tribunal had devoted itself for days and weeks, or even for months, as it has done in more than one case, to a faithful consideration of a question and embody its conclusion in a formal order—nothing, I say, was ever more absurd than that this Government should permit another one of its tribunals, without an hour's investigation or consideration, to set that order aside. It was under that conviction, sir, that I proposed the amendment in the Senate which forbade any court of the United States to set aside such an order except after a full hearing of the case; and if the Senator from Minnesota and other Senators who believe as he does and as I do, that there have been gross abuses of this injunctive process, will unite with me, we will forever eliminate that cause of complaint.

My amendment was rejected because many Senators thought it unconstitutional, but in a succeeding Congress the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] proposed and secured the adoption of an amendment which embodied the same principle. That amendment was afterwards assailed in the courts upon the very ground that it was unconstitutional, because it impaired the faculties of the court; but the Supreme Court of the United States, without dignifying it by an elaborate argument, unanimously held it constitutional, and thus affirmed the power of Congress to do what I think it ought to have done 10 years ago, and what, if we would take advantage of the present situation, we would do now.

I would offer the amendment, but so many of our friends in the other argument averred the unconstitutionality of the proposal that I do not feel justified in again introducing it and thus compelling them to reassert that opinion. If, however, that were done and the Commerce Court and all other courts were denied the power to suspend an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission until they had given it due and full consideration, all just complaint on that ground would disappear.

Mark you, Mr. President, I do not say all complaint, because the time will never come when there will not be men to complain whenever the courts decide any controversy contrary to their wishes; but there would be no just complaint if that court were compelled to hear every case before it interferred with an order of the commission.

Mr. President, there is one more view of this matter which we must not overlook. If we abolish this court, we will restore the old practice under which the attorneys for the railroads always applied for their injunctions to those judges who were supposed to be most favorable to their view of these questions; and in this way they obtained an injunction just as often as they can ever obtain them through the Commerce Court.

If the President made any mistakes in the appointment of the judges who now constitute this court—and I do not say he has done so—it will not be long until that mistake will be completely remedied. Within a certain time each one of the present judges must pass out of this court and into the general judiciary system of the country, and their successors are to be selected by the great Chief Justice, whom, I presume, it will not be flattery to say all men are willing to trust.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator construe the law creating this court as making no provision for the appointment of successors by the President and their confirmation by the Senate? Or does the Senator think that as these judges are passed into the other circuits their places will be filled exclusively by details of existing judges now on the Federal bench?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the law undoubtedly provides for their designation by the Chief Justice, and that is one feature of the law which raised in my mind a doubt of its constitutionality.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not catch my point. I myself think that the law fails to make provision for the appointment of any new judges as these judges pass into the service of the circuit courts. I have no doubt it was intended the other way. But, while I have not looked at the law for a year or more, my recollection is very clear that when I did examine it I came to that conclusion—that the law makes no provision for the appointment of other judges to this particular court as vacancies may occur. It seems to me that when the original judges were appointed that exhausted the power given by the law; that thereafter there could be no appointments made to fill vacancies caused by their death or resignation, and that they must be filled altogether by judges being brought from the circuit courts.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, a peculiarity of the law was that it provided for the appointment of men to an office that did not exist. It provided for the appointment of five circuit judges of the United States—I believe that was the number. There was no such office as that known to our law. A man must be a circuit judge of the first or the second or the fourth or the ninth district. The office of a circuit judge is a definite one, with his geographical jurisdiction defined as well as his legal jurisdiction. I know it may be said that the very provision for the appointment of these judges in effect created the office, and that may answer that objection.

But, Mr. President, it is not so easy to answer the suggestion that the circuit judge of a particular circuit can not be required to absent himself from his circuit, abandon the performance of the duties of the office to which he was appointed, and be compelled to perform the duties of another and a different office. To my mind, that is a very grave question.

Mr. BACON. Not only that, but he s denied the right to perform the duties of the office to which he was appointed. You not only give him duties that do not belong to him, but the law takes away from the judge the duties that do belong to him.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, and I have just emphasized it.

Another difficulty, to my mind, Mr. President, is this: After the first five have been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, all the judges who shall hereafter discharge the duties of that court will discharge them without receiving an appointment from the President to that particular office or being confirmed by the Senate. But it seems that those questions have not perplexed those whose duty it is to decide them. I take it that if there had been in the minds of those in charge of the Government's cases or those in charge of the railroads' cases any doubt about the constitutionality of this act, the question would have been raised, and it would have been decided. The fact that it has not been raised, so far as I am informed, compels me to conclude that my doubts were not well founded.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. On the phase of the question which the Senator has been discussing, can the question be sharply raised until after the terms of the present judges, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, expire, and cases then come before the court the judges of which shall have been assigned to their functions under the statute by the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court?

Mr. BAILEY. I think, Mr. President, if the bill provided machinery without the warrant of the Constitution the question could have been raised at any time. It could have been raised in the very first case.

Mr. SHIVELY. Would it have been available to the extent and in the sense that it would be available when the court shall be constituted by assignment by the Chief Justice? At present the court could reply, "We have been appointed by the President of the United States under an act of Congress. Our appointments were made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. We are exercising our jurisdiction under the appointments thus made and the powers thus conferred."

A court composed of judges assigned to it by the Chief Justice and not appointed to it by the President nor confirmed by the Senate could not answer in this way.

Mr. BAILEY. But Mr. President, if that answer had been made to my plea assailing the constitutionality of the court, I would have answered, whether it be as you say or otherwise, this law provides for the unconstitutional designation of your successors, and the whole act falls, or, at least, the whole part of the act that relates to this subject.

Another thing I would say, in answer to a suggestion like that, is that you can not appoint a circuit judge of the United States for five years. You can not appoint a judge of any court of the United States for less than life.

By the way, Mr. President, that is not accurate. I do not agree that a judge holds his office for life. He holds it merely during his good behavior. I have never believed that in order to remove a judge it is necessary to prove against him the same things it would be necessary to prove against an officer holding for a fixed term, who can not be impeached except for high crimes or misdemeanors.

But, at any rate, whether I am wrong or right about that, the circuit judges of the United States must be appointed and can only be appointed to hold office during good behavior. Therefore, if they were appointed merely for the five years during which they must sit in this court, the appointment was clearly without the warrant of the Constitution.

Of course those who framed the act sought to obviate that difficulty by providing for the appointment of circuit judges, and then limiting the duties of this particular office in point of time. But I surrender my doubts, because nobody else who has investigated the subject seems to share them.

But, leaving that matter aside, Mr. President, with the right kind of a court, limited by a prohibition against the issuance of preliminary injunctions, I do not believe it possible for the wisdom of men to devise a better method than this of speedily and justly settling these great questions. If we leave these questions to be decided by such courts as the railroad lawyers may from time to time select, we shall have vexatious delays, and we, perhaps, may have a repetition of some of the scandals that have heretofore discredited our judiciary.

I therefore believe the creation of this court was a wise provision. Furthermore, I venture the prediction that if it is left to stand it will so completely vindicate itself within the next 20 years that no Senator with any experience in the practice of the law would vote for its abolition.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think the argument which the Senator from Texas has just made is a very conclusive argument in favor of a special tribunal to deal with these questions. My objection to the Commerce Court, however, is that as a result of its creation we have two special tribunals to deal with the same question.

If we had no great tribunal like the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has been established for a number of years, and which by its operation has justified its existence, undoubtedly the argument of the Senator from Texas would be unanswerable in favor of the creation of such a tribunal. The objection to the Commerce Court is that it undoes the work of the very kind of a tribunal which the Senator has described.

I think the remedy which the Senator from Texas suggests to what he justly says have been abuses in the way of issuing preliminary injunctions, viz, to abolish to all intents and purposes preliminary injunctions, is far more radical than the abolishment of this court.

The Senator from Texas, because the remedy has been abused, would abolish the remedy altogether. Preliminary injunction is a remedy that has grown up out of necessity through centuries of experience and need. Should the Congress undertake to pass a law absolutely prohibiting the issuance of a preliminary injunction in any case, that law will come up some day as an instrument of oppression, or a means of protecting oppression.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, I want to be understood. I would not go to the extent of prohibiting the issuance of a preliminary injunction, except in a case where there had been an ascertainment and a determination by another Government tribunal.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that is the limitation which the Senator would impose upon it; but even with that limitation it would be a very radical measure. It is perfectly easy to conceive the abuse by that tribunal of its powers. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in my judgment, has not abused its powers, but it might do so. In view of the conflict of interests in this country over questions of this kind, in which the interests are so tremendous and the effect upon the property of people is so acute, we can not say that no case will arise in which the Interstate Commerce Commission will abuse its powers, in which event a preliminary injunction may be essential to protecting somebody's rights.

It is not proposed by the abolishment of the Commerce Court to deprive any interested party of the benefit of legitimate review. The suggestion was made here this morning—and it is perfectly feasible—that appeals be taken directly to the circuit court of appeals, or, on constitutional questions, to the Supreme Court of the United States. Those features may be dealt with hereafter.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, he does not mean to suggest that it would go to the Supreme Court of the United States before there was judgment in any other court. That could hardly be, because the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court ought not to be exercised except on appeal from some judicial tribunal, which the Interstate Commerce Commission is not. If it were possible to vest that court with jurisdiction over an appeal from a nonjudicial tribunal, and still compel it to go into the facts, how would you have your trial?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Only questions of law would be involved. There would be no questions of fact.

Mr. BAILEY. But those questions of law depend upon questions of fact.

THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the resolution goes to the calendar. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 20182.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1911.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am very anxious to make some headway with this tariff bill, but the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] wishes to finish his speech, begun several days ago, and which is a question of the highest privilege, and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is so insistent about going on with the appropriation bill now before the Senate that I will not press the tariff bill to-day. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that to be for the remainder of the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that that was the request of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. While the Senator from Wyoming is on his feet, let me ask him if he hopes to finish the appropriation bill to-day.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is the height of my ambition to close the appropriation bill to-day. We have been all through this week considering it and have made slow progress. I certainly shall occupy no unnecessary time in debate, and I hope we may finish it to-day. I am very desirous of finishing it, because there is to follow necessarily a long and exhaustive consideration with those from another place in conference. I am anxious to see the appropriation bills, if possible, enacted before the 1st of July, when otherwise we would be without funds to conduct the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether, after the appropriation bill is disposed of, either to-day or Monday, there will be any other appropriation bill that is urgent to be immediately brought before the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. We have a conference report which, of course, must be disposed of without any further delay, and there are bills coming from other than the regular Committee on Appropriations upon the calendar. So far as the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am chairman, is concerned, there will be some days after the pending appropriation bill is disposed of, if we are fortunate enough to dispose of it to-day, before I shall move to take up any other bill from that committee. However, there are two or three appropriation bills reported from other committees on the calendar. As the Senator knows, the Indian appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, and the Military Academy appropriation bill are on the calendar. I do not think of any others, but those three are on the calendar. None of them will be in my charge.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say that after the pending appropriation bill is disposed of I shall insist upon the Senate taking up the unfinished business before any other appropriation bill is taken up.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, although not in charge of those bills, I will say to the Senator that I shall be glad to conform to his wish if it can be accomplished in any reasonable time. If we are going to get into very prolonged debate on the tariff bill, I should feel like going to the rescue of those who have the other appropriation bills in charge and try to obtain consideration in order to get them through, but I hope the Senator will succeed in obtaining what he desires in the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. SIMMONS. So far as the chemical schedule bill is concerned, I do not think it will occupy more than a day or two at the furthest.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. KERN. I ask that Senate resolution 315 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the resolution is laid before the Senate for the purpose of discussion.

The Secretary read the resolution, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, on yesterday shortly before the conclusion of my remarks I was discussing the testimony of one Charles McGowan as illustrating the character and conduct of Edward Hines and as further showing how little credibility was to be attached to his testimony. It will be remembered the witness McGowan testified to the very incredible statement related on yesterday. I should also have stated that after he had testified in Washington he very soon made a request on Mr. C. F. Wiehe, Mr. Hines's brother-in-law, for a loan of $5,000, although he had been acquainted with Mr. Wiehe only a few weeks. But a little later on he made a demand on Mr. Wiehe or the Edward Hines Lumber Co., through Mr. Wiehe, with whom he transacted business, for a considerable sum of money on account of the damages he had sustained by a loss of business while he was present in Washington testifying in the trial.

The evidence shows that Mr. Wiehe compromised that demand with $300, after which Mr. McGowan wrote the letter spoken of yesterday and which I could not at that moment find in the record, but which I have now found and desire to read. It shows something of the character of McGowan and of his relations with Edward Hines and Christian F. Wiehe. Writing to the detective, A. C. Bailey, he said:

ELORA, ONT., November 19, 1911.

A. C. BAILEY, Esq.,
1607 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

MY DEAR ART.: Your very kind letter received some days ago, and I note you say you are all business. For myself, eating, sleeping, and smoking comprise my daily duties at present. A day or so after my return home the Hines people sent me a telegram asking me to meet one of them in Toronto. I presume they wanted some more affidavits or something, so I wired them they had better come to Elora. By God, they would have been shown what forced hospitality was! The old shotgun would have been loaded with a couple of Peters No. 2. I made them come across, at that—not all I expected, though—and I had a hell of a time getting it, too. Had to threaten him with all kinds of exposure.

I was so sorry I did not see you the afternoon I left, but hope we will meet again in the near future. I do not know just now what my plans will be for next year. Father is talking very seriously of buying a flour mill for my brother and myself. What kind of a miller would I make, do you think?

Let me hear from you as often as you can spare the time to write, and if you are in this vicinity any time, run up; I will always be glad to see you.

Yours, etc.,
CHAS. MCGOWAN.

P. S.—Give my best to your brother.

McG.

It will be interesting to know what kind of exposure this witness threatened the Hines people with in order to make them

"come across" with money respecting his testimony. The letter itself and the other testimony surrounding it is very eloquent in explanation, not only of the character of man McGowan is, not only of the fact that McGowan committed perjury in this hearing, but also of the character of the men who sent for him and brought him here and who afterwards settled with him because of the false testimony which he gave—testimony which, as I said yesterday, was so false on its face as to need no rebuttal.

As further illustrating the connection between the Senator from Illinois and Lee O'Neil Browne, I call attention to the testimony of Senator LORIMER, in which he states (p. 7506) that he contributed—or, as he expressed it, "loaned"; or, as he still further expressed it, "loaned and contributed"—to Lee O'Neil Browne $10,000, or in the neighborhood of $10,000, not only for the defense of Lee O'Neil Browne, but also for the defense of the man Robert E. Wilson, who, as Lee O'Neil Browne's agent or subagent, paid out the second installment of corruption money at St. Louis. It is but fair to give in this connection Senator LORIMER's version of the transaction, and I read:

Senator LORIMER. Why, yes. I will tell you how that came about, Judge. He came to see me at the bank, and was talking about the White matter.

Mr. HANECY. The matter of Charles A. White?

Senator LORIMER. Yes. I asked him about his financial condition, and he said that he had a good practice and made all the money he needed, but that he had no money saved up, and he said that he did not have money enough to employ the lawyers he thought necessary to conduct his case, and I told him I would let him have some money; but he said that he did not know when I would get it back, and if he died soon I would never get it back. I told him that was all right; that this fight was really a fight on me and not on him; that they did not care anything about him; what they were trying to do was to get me out of my seat in the Senate. So I loaned him money from time to time as he asked for it, and I think somewhere in the neighborhood of $10,000.

Notwithstanding the fact that the witnesses testified as they did as to receiving this money in St. Louis from Browne and from Wilson, and the fact that there is only a half-hearted denial that these legislators did receive that money at their hands, the Senator insists that the prosecution against these men was not in good faith, and that the grand-jury indictment against them was really an attack on him and not on the miscreants who had thus flagrantly violated the law of the land. A little further along:

Senator KERN. Did you take his note for this money?

Senator LORIMER. I did not.

Senator KERN. What account did you keep of it?

Senator LORIMER. I do not know whether I have checks for it or not, Senator.

Senator KERN. In what form was it paid?

Senator LORIMER. I say I do not know. He always came to the bank, and I do not know whether I drew checks to my own order and got the money for him or gave him checks and he got the money himself. I do not recall.

Senator KERN. Did you make a charge of it?

Senator LORIMER. It is not very much of an account at that. I have always considered that if Lee O'Neil Browne was never able to pay me that money, it was money which I ought to have contributed to help him in the contest. It was my fight and not his.

Senator KERN. You kept no account of it at all?

Senator LORIMER. I think I could tell how much it was by looking over my affairs at home.

Senator KERN. No; that is not it. I am asking you whether you kept any account of it.

Senator LORIMER. Do you mean that I kept books of it? I did not.

Senator KERN. You made no entry on any book of the amount you advanced him?

Senator LORIMER. No; I did not.

Senator KERN. And you can not at present tell the amount any more nearly than that it was eight or ten thousand dollars?

Senator LORIMER. Yes; some——

Senator KERN. Would you say it was not more than $10,000?

Senator LORIMER. I am sure it was not over $10,000. It may have been two or three hundred dollars over $10,000, and it may have been a little less than that.

Senator KERN. On how many occasions did he come to you for money?

Senator LORIMER. I do not know. It may have been four or six or seven times. I know I gave it to him in amounts ranging from a thousand dollars to two or three thousand dollars.

It is well enough in this connection, Mr. President, in dealing with the credibility of the testimony here to state that when Lee O'Neil Browne testified he gave the committee to understand that the amount of this contribution was in the neighborhood of only about $1,500. I am not going to comment on that testimony or the testimony of Senator LORIMER on that subject; I am simply putting it in here as the closing chapter in the evidence which draws these men together and which has held them together from a day about a week before the senatorial election in May, 1909, down to the present time.

It has been said here, and it was repeated over and over again in the hearings, that Browne was acquitted of the charge against him in the courts at Chicago on the second trial.

Mr. President, after there was shown to the committee the existence of a bipartisan machine in Chicago, where there was a partnership in the county offices and where men of different parties worked together in the accomplishment of their common purposes, when the underoffices of the county and of the courts were farmed out as political jobs and given indiscriminately to Democrats and Republicans in such way as to best promote the fortunes of the machine, it would seem strange if it were not difficult to convict politicians of either party of any crime which might be charged against them. If you will read the testimony of the distinguished and able and honest prosecuting attorney of Cook County I think you will understand what his opinion is as to the character of the jury that acquitted Lee O'Neil Browne of that charge in the face of the cloud of witnesses that appeared against him and the mountain of evidence that was adduced.

Mr. President, I have given to the Senate comparatively few of the evidences of corruption in this election as disclosed by the circumstances shown at the hearings. The pages of this voluminous record absolutely teem with such instances.

It is set forth in the report of the majority here that there is no new evidence that is material to the issue here. Mr. President, there are 8,000 pages of new testimony. Hundreds of such pages contain material evidence not adduced at the former hearing, and a mere cursory examination of this record will attest the truth of that proposition which I lay down.

I have already taxed the patience of the Senate, and I will not occupy more time in a further review of the disgusting details of the corrupt methods which brought the fair name of Illinois temporarily into disrepute. I use the word "temporarily" advisedly, for that grand old State of Lincoln and Douglas has already righted herself, and an aroused and indignant people have but recently spoken on this question and placed the seal of their condemnation on the practices which prevailed in Springfield in 1909 and which resulted in the election now in question.

Briefly to recapitulate, Mr. President, commencing back in April and May, 1909, it appears that the great interests of this country—and everybody now understands what we mean here when the words "great interests" are used—the great interests of the country desired the election of Mr. LORIMER because his one vote was needed in the Senate for the enactment of legislation in the interest of special privilege. The great interests of this country, in their desire for favorable legislation, have never lacked for money when money was needed. It has not been so many years, sir, since these great interests that were interested in the enactment of the several schedules of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill were able to contribute millions and millions of dollars for the purchase of the office of President of the United States. It was only by accident that the source of those funds was discovered. It was only by accident, sir, that years afterwards it was discovered that the officers of the great insurance companies of the land had embezzled the money of their policy holders in order to enrich the campaign fund of the interests; that the directors of national banks had embezzled the money of their stockholders in order to augment the campaign fund necessary for the advancement of the cause of special privilege.

We have not forgotten how these same special interests boasted of their ability to "fry the fat" out of the beneficiaries of the protective tariff a few years before. These interests were represented in Washington by Edward Hines. He was one of their richest, one of their most powerful and successful representatives. A perusal of his testimony here discloses his business in Washington. He was interested in certain schedules. He remained here away from his business in Chicago for months and months. He was one of the commanders of their forces here. He tells in his testimony how when Congressmen were presumably opposed to the special privileges conferred by the Payne-Aldrich bill they were taken to the Willard Hotel in Washington and given great dinners and wined and dined in the interest of honest legislation, to the end that they might be stimulated to the proper discharge of their duties under their oaths. The testimony shows that he was a fair representative of those great interests which in the past have used money to accomplish their purposes. He was the man selected by the high priests of privilege to carry out their will.

According to his testimony, Mr. Aldrich sent him to Illinois to bring about the election of Mr. LORIMER to the Senate. His story as to the circumstances attending his trip from Washington to Illinois is full of meaning when properly analyzed. He says, and would have the committee and have the Senate believe, that his only purpose in going to Springfield was to carry a message from Mr. Aldrich to Gov. Deneen, informing him that it was the desire of Aldrich and of the President that LORIMER be elected. That is his story. Is it entitled to credit? Let Senator LORIMER's testimony speak on that subject. The precise question now under discussion is as to whether Edward Hines's story that he was sent by Senator Aldrich to Springfield to bear a message of that kind to Gov. Deneen is true or not. Senator LORIMER testified positively that Gov. Deneen had that information 10 days before Edward Hines made that trip. I read from page 7465:

Senator KERN. Did you and Gov. Deneen, before you ceased communication with him, talk over the fact that the President and Senator PENROSE and Senator Aldrich and others were anxious for your election?

Senator LORIMER. Yes.

Senator KERN. Did he tell you that he had received that information—that all those parties were anxious for your election? He had not been in Washington.

Senator LORIMER. I think it was a matter of common knowledge in Springfield about that time.

Senator KERN. If it was a matter of common knowledge in Springfield, why was it necessary for Mr. Hines to carry the message he did all the way from Washington to Springfield?

Senator LORIMER. Why Mr. Hines carried the message, or why somebody directed him to do those things, I do not know. I was not in control of them.

There is the fact, which must be undisputed, that the message which Mr. Hines said he was carrying to Gov. Deneen was of a fact that for 10 days had not only been in the possession of Gov. Deneen, but was a matter of common knowledge in Springfield. Of course the proposition that he was sent from Washington with that kind of a message and nothing more is too absurd to receive a moment's notice, it being a matter of common knowledge in Springfield.

There was some other reason why such a man as Edward Hines should be sent by the representatives of these interests out there. He does not go to Springfield at all. Early on the morning of the election he arrives in Chicago, and where does he go? To his own office, where he has a private telephone exchange, where the Western Union Telegraph Co. has a branch office? Oh, no; he does not go there. He wants to telephone, he says. Does he go to the Union League Club or the other club of which he is a member, where all the accessories are convenient for telegraphing or telephoning? No, no; he goes to a bank. He does his telephoning there, and his own word is all we have for what occurred there. Cook says that in the telephone conversation which occurred a little later at the Grand Pacific Hotel he said, "Go ahead; leave no stone unturned; all the money is at hand that is necessary to put him over." The assurance was given there, and the election occurred within two hours of that time. He says he did not there speak of money; he simply said, "Leave no stone unturned."

In other words, according to Mr. Hines it was a harmless and colorless telephone conversation that Cook and O'Brien heard, and yet when the White story was exposed and when the grand jury was suddenly summoned together, when Mr. Hines learned that his friends Cook and O'Brien, who had heard this innocent conversation, were stopping at the Grand Pacific Hotel, he called his brother-in-law, Wiehe, out of bed at midnight by telephone, sent him down there in posthaste to see Cook and O'Brien; and, according to the testimony of these two men, corroborated by the testimony of Wiehe, he urged them to leave the city that night, that there was a grand-jury subpœna out for them and it was necessary that they flee the confines of Cook County lest they be made to tell the truth about that conversation. That circumstance is powerfully corroborative of the testimony of Cook that there was something improper in that conversation; it is a strong refutation of the testimony of Hines, of Wiehe, and of the miserable Baker, that there was nothing wrong in the conversation, nothing of which any man need be afraid.

Where did the money come from in the first instance? The accountants certified that the books of Hines and the books of Tilden showed nothing as to any corruption fund; there was no evidence of a corruption fund written out on any book kept by Edward Hines or any book kept by Edward Tilden. Edward Tilden testified that, although he engaged in transactions frequently involving hundreds of thousands of dollars or more, as to his own personal transactions he kept no books at all, except upon loose sheets of paper that were afterwards destroyed. That circumstance gives color to the testimony of Mr. Funk that Hines said to him, "Just send the money to Ed. Tilden." Perhaps he was the only man in Chicago who kept the accounts of his financial affairs in that way. Mr. President, did any member of this committee or any Member of this Senate suppose that when those accountants were sent to examine the books of Edward Hines they would find written there in a bold, free hand a full account of his connection with bribery or corruption? There was no such thought anywhere. These men, as I said yesterday, who furnish and engage in the first handling of these large sums of money, keep no books. Bribe money is never represented in checks; it is never represented by bank drafts, but it is represented by cold money; and the men engaged in this business hire, because of their rare ability in this line of work, the shrewdest and smartest men to be found in the country, men willing—of course willing—to commit perjury in case of detection. They leave no traces; they write down nothing; so it was not expected that any accountant would find written down on any book the evidence of the original source of any part of this fund.

It is a matter of no consequence, Mr. President, whether the money came from New York or from New England, from California or from the South; it makes no difference whether the money came from the lumber interest or from any other special interest, the vital question is, Did these members of the legislature receive money? Did Lee O'Neil Browne and Robert E. Wilson and John Broderick pay money? If they paid the money, and if those members of the legislature received the money, if that money was being exhibited in every part of Illinois in the form of hundred-dollar bills about the time of this distribution, which was connected with this senatorial election, and which was in pursuance of a corrupt arrangement made with reference to that election, then, sir, this case is settled regardless of the question as to what men or corporations in the first place furnished the money.

The money was in the hands of Browne and Wilson and Broderick. With it they corrupted the Legislature of Illinois—not all of them, Mr. President; I would not have had it understood the other day, and I do not want it understood to-day, that every one of the 53 Democrats who voted for WILLIAM LORIMER was necessarily corrupted. Some of them ignorant men, some of them blind followers of a corrupt leadership, voted as they did because they had no mind of their own and probably were denied the share of the money which they might have claimed to the end that the others might receive more. Luke, Holstlaw, Blair, and the others heretofore designated were corrupted; that they were corrupted has been established beyond the possibility of a doubt, so the problem as to who furnished the original money is not vital to this investigation.

THE SYSTEM.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois, whose right to a seat here is challenged, in his speech to the Senate last February told the story of his early life with great dramatic effect, and has repeated that story in detail in his testimony before this committee.

It was to the effect that his father, who was a minister, died when he was 10 years old, leaving a widow and several small children, of which he was the eldest; that the circumstances of the family were such that he was obliged to and did sell newspapers and black boots to aid in the support of his mother and her younger children; that he so continued for some years, when he worked in a store, a laundry, a coal yard, and the packing houses, becoming a car conductor when 20 years old and continuing in that business for five years, after which he held positions under the city administration, took teaming contracts, engaged in the real-estate business, and was elected to Congress in 1894.

This is an interesting human-interest story, and reflects great credit upon the Senator from Illinois. Substantially the same story can be truthfully told of many men who have occupied public positions in this country, for hundreds of men who have attained eminence in this country have come up through great tribulation, knowing by bitter experience of the privations of poverty, the biting of hunger, and the lack of the pleasures that ought to belong to childhood.

Too much credit can not be given to these men who from their childhood have fought against adversity, and who, by their sublime courage and tireless industry, have won the victory and in the end won eminence.

But, Mr. President, it would seem that this story of these incidents of life are rather beside the serious question to be determined here. The history of our jurisprudence is full of instances where men who as children had hard lives, and who possessed great courage and industry, had been guilty of wrongdoing. Such a story may touch our hearts, but can not, if we are true to ourselves, control our judgments.

Let us look at the other side of the Senator's life. He entered the field of politics when a young man in 1884 in Chicago—the most unpromising, the most corrupt field, in the Middle West. He was elected constable two years later, and about the same time became a member of the county committee, which position he has held during all these years.

He testifies (p. 7853) that on account of these activities he became thoroughly familiar with the details of Chicago politics and with the men of both parties who managed politics in that city. He testifies that up to the advent of civil service, which was only a few years ago, there were from 12,000 to 15,000 public offices and appointments to be distributed among the ward organizations of the successful party; that he was an important figure in this vicious system, being in fact a part of it, having the patronage of several wards to distribute among the workers. He testified on that subject as follows:

I got that patronage from the sheriff, the county clerk, the county treasurer, all the clerks of the different courts, the park commissioners, the mayor, the city clerk, the city attorney, and all the different elected officials; and as time rolled on of course there were many changes made, and it rarely happened, until Gov. Deneen was elected governor, that any appointment, big or little, was made in the section of the city in which I lived without my recommendation (p. 7854).

His testimony shows that by reason of this system of machine politics he was thrown in contact with the most vicious political elements of that city; that the spoils were distributed not only to Republicans, but that official favors were granted to Democrats who would serve him and the interests of his party; that he maintained friendly, and in some cases intimate, relationships, personal as well as political, with such notorious characters as "Hinky Dink" Kenna, the now discredited John Broderick, Manny Abrahams, Cyril Jandus, and many others; that he obtained a position in the Republican county clerk's office for John Walsh, a Democratic member of the legislature, who voted for him for Senator (pp. 7635–7636), and performed a similar service for Representative Hilton with a like result (p. 7619).

A more perfect-working bipartisan machine has never been in existence, and the circumstances developed by the evidence show that Senator LORIMER became the most powerful of all the leaders and directors of that system. This fact was so notorious that the system itself came to be known as "Lorimerism." This kindly disposed man, with his good heart, his humane impulses, his domestic happiness, thus, by reason of his environment in early life, was drawn into this form of political life. Like a true man, he desired to stand by those who had been his friends in times of stress and storm, and followed them into the current of political wrongdoing.

O Mr. President, it would have been better if this kindly man had been born and reared elsewhere. It would have been better had he been brought up on the prairie, in the forest, or amongst the mountains, that he might have been closer to nature, that he might have known more of the people of this land, that he might have known more of their hopes, their ambitions, and their aspirations, and that he might have profited thereby. One reason I say that is because in his testimony, in explaining why various members of the legislature voted for him, he would say, "That member voted for me because So-and-so, the leader in that district, was for me; and this man voted for me because the leader, the boss, in that neighborhood was for me; and so of the others." So, finally, when the question was asked him as to whether or not the people were not entitled to representation, rather than the machine leaders and bosses, his answer disclosed his estimate of popular government and his mistaken notion as to the source of power in this Republic. This is the question asked:

The voters were the ones to whom they were under obligations for support?

Senator LORIMER replied:

Senator LORIMER. Oh, yes. That is the way men talk who reach the clouds, you know, when they are making that kind of a speech—that the voters are the men that they are responsible to. Of course they are, but voters are human beings.

If you will look through this testimony in which Senator LORIMER explains the reasons why the various members of the legislature voted for him, you will find in a very large number of instances that he put it upon the ground not that the people were for him, but that the bosses—the leaders in the various districts and in the counties—were for him. In one instance, where the sentiment of the ward was one way and the representative voted another way, he justified the conduct of the member in following the boss rather than the people.

Mr. President, it is not to WILLIAM LORIMER, the self-made man, the devoted head of an interesting family, that objection is made. That WILLIAM LORIMER will have the approval of every man of generous impulses; but the system of which WILLIAM LORIMER is a part, the system which undertakes by corrupt methods to thwart the popular will, must be condemned. It is the WILLIAM LORIMER who represents these methods, who carries them out through the Lee O'Neil Brownes and the Brodericks, that is on trial here, and who must stand or fall not because of his personal or domestic qualities, but by the record he has made in this senatorial contest and the acts of his accredited agents. We may regard the man with admiration because of good personal qualities; but the vicious system of politics, which stifles patriotic sentiment, belittles popular rights, and corrupts the very fountainhead of American liberty, must receive condemnation at the hands of the American Senate.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, to my mind there is no question pending before Congress of more vital importance, of more far-reaching consequence, to this Nation than that of the increase of our Navy. A mistake made in this matter now would be most difficult to correct in the future and would be fraught with great danger and might in the coming years culminate in national disaster.

Recognizing this fully, I have determined, as a member of the Naval Committee, to present to the Senate the reasons which compel me to the conviction that the best interest of this Nation demands that we should without hesitation, without interruption, continue our policy of progressively increasing our naval strength. All of the first-class powers of the world are continuously pursuing this policy. One of the marked characteristics of modern times is the tremendous increase in naval strength in all countries in comparison to military strength. This phenomena is strikingly witnessed alike in Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, and Japan. Each of these countries is rapidly increasing its navy for the purpose of acquiring naval power.

The inquiry naturally presents itself, Why do nations, for the purposes of offensive or defensive warfare, depend now more upon navies than upon armies? The reason is evident. The oceans, which were formerly considered barriers of separation between nations, have, since the introduction and use of steam, become the easiest and best means of communication. Water now closely joins nations. It no longer severs them. New York for all purposes of commerce or war is closer to London than to San Francisco.

During the recent war between Japan and Russia, Japan, by her command of the seas, was enabled to mass more rapidly a superior force in Manchuria than was Russia by her system of railroads. By commanding the seas the western coast of Asia for all purposes of war was as suitable and convenient as if it had been a part of Japan. Besides, the time has passed in the history of the world when any nation can successfully lead an isolated life. All parts of the habitable globe are closely connected now by fast steamers. These exchange the product of one country with another. Even in remote villages can now be obtained the products of almost all foreign countries. The development and prosperity of every nation is largely dependent upon its foreign commerce. For any civilized nation to be denied access to the seas for the sale and purchase of commodities would mean its financial bankruptcy and ruin. Especially is this true of the United States, whose exports exceed that of any nation. Our great crops of tobacco, cotton, wheat, and corn would find no profitable sale unless we had access to the seas to sell them in foreign markets. Our vast meat products would spoil on our hands but for foreign trade. Our immense manufacturing and mining industries would languish except for the great outlet found in foreign countries for our surplus. Thus the prosperity of farm, forest, and factory are inseparably interwoven with our foreign commerce. The conditions that prevail here exist in other nations. Thus, all the first-class powers of the world, fully recognizing that their future development, prosperity, and greatness are dependent upon their having free access to the seas and free exchange of commodities, are endeavoring to acquire navies of sufficient strength to guarantee this. They desire to be strong enough to obtain this as a matter of right and not receive it as an act of favor. In modern commerce, with its varied trade complexities, the nation that is helpless upon the seas is the prey of all marauders and has its future destiny directed by others. On account of the mutual jealousies of nations it may for years be unmolested and be permitted to prosper, but if it is rich the day of its despoilment will inevitably come. The national and individual weak, when rich, have ever been the prey of the strong.

The history of the world teaches one sure lesson, that naval supremacy ultimately means national preeminence and triumph. More than ever before sea power is the best and strongest military power. The rise and fall of nations and empires teach the same lesson, that national safety and national success are inseparable from naval strength and power. The destruction of the Spanish Armada in the English Channel was the first and controlling cause in the bloody drama which ended a few years ago when the flag of crimson and gold was banished from the western world and Spain closed her glittering career. Trafalgar was but the prelude of Waterloo. All the vast power, the amazing genius and energy of Napoleon could not escape the doom inflicted by Lord Nelson's fleet. The heroic valor, the superb military genius, the splendid victories of the Confederacy during the late Civil War all faded before Federal naval supremacy. The shadows of Southern doom rose slowly but surely from the pitiless sea. The stupendous superstructure of Russian power and military strength all crumbled at the triumph of Admiral Togo's fleet. Dewey's guns at Manila proclaimed alike the liberation of the Philippines, Cuba, and Porto Rico. The Italian Navy is the strong hand to-day which seizes Tripoli from the feeble grasp of Turkey. It was the great navy of Great Britain that enabled her to carry her rule, civilization, and commerce to every continent, in every clime, and among every people. It enabled her to wrest from France the territory of Canada, with vast possessions stretching to the North Pole. It has given her colonies in the far waters of the Pacific, exceeding in territory and richness any domain ever ruled by the Cæsars. It enabled her to conquer and rule the mighty Empire of India, which had resisted the arms and thwarted the triumphs of Alexander. It has given her Egypt, the most ancient of nations, and brought to her the greater part of Africa, with its immense territory and vast riches. The naval supremacy of Great Britain has given her one-fifth of the habitable globe, which receives as law her will.

Mr. President, each year will witness the increase of national safety, power, and prosperity from the possession of naval strength. The world is on the eve of a material development, far exceeding anything which the imagination of the past has thought possible. The Tropics are destined in the near future to have a prodigality of production and an increase of wealth almost unspeakable. Modern medical science is fast making the Tropics as much suited for the health and energy of man as any part of the globe. The day is not far distant when medicine will triumph over the enervating and destroying diseases incident to the Tropics. When this day arrives, the Tropics, with their great agricultural productiveness and richness, with their vast mineral and forest wealth, with their great water power and opportunities for manufacturing establishments, will become the centers of great wealth and commercial advantages which can not be overestimated. Nations must be prepared to participate in the wealth which will accrue from the vast commerce that the future holds in store for these parts of the world. Nations unpossessed of naval strength will be either excluded or discriminated against in this great trade.

The unrest and revolutions in China indicate that that mighty Empire, containing almost one-fifth of the population of the world, is being stirred by modern thought and will soon enter upon a career of material development with an immense commerce. Nations will only acquire a fair and equal opportunity in this great and profitable trade which possess naval strength sufficient to demand it. Everywhere we witness aggression on the part of the first-class powers of the world, possessed of naval strength. All of the continent of Africa has been partitioned among the European powers and is subject to European direction and domination. All of Asia, except Japan, is practically under control of European powers. Each year we witness the further increase of European influence and domination. The ancient monarchy of Persia was but last year partitioned between Great Britain and Russia. Turkey, helpless without a navy, but awaits the hour of her despoilers to reach an agreement as to a proper division of her territory. Japan has maintained her independence and her wishes are respected only because of her naval and military power. Nearly all the islands of the seas are under control of European influences. The Central and South American States have not been the subject of spoliation by European powers only because the United States has maintained as its declared foreign policy the great Monroe doctrine, which protects these from European aggression, and because the United States has naval power sufficient to enforce this doctrine if challenged. The political affairs of the world are now practically regulated by the first-class powers possessed of military and naval strength. However much we may dislike it, however unjust and improper it may be, the six great powers, consisting of the United States, Great Britain, Germany, Russia, France, and Japan, when they act in accord, determine the destiny of nations and the future progress of the world. The future of China will be determined by these powers, either by peaceful agreement or by war. The assent of these powers will fix the terms of peace between Italy and Turkey. However much we may deplore it, it is impossible to disguise the fact that the world to-day is being policed and regulated by the six great naval powers. The smaller nations are being told by the larger ones what they must do. A nation to-day is only safe from foreign policing and can only direct its own destiny when it is possessed of sufficient naval strength and power to have it respected and feared. Never before in the history of the world has there been a greater necessity for naval power to insure national safety and independence. The great European powers have for the last decades acted in harmony, because they have been finding sufficient spoils in weaker nations for division. While in the last 20 years the world has been loudly preaching peace and organizing tribunals for arbitration, yet political aggression and despoilment have been proceeding to a greater degree than ever before. During these years, as previously stated, the great continent of Africa and, for all practical purposes, nearly all of the continent of Asia have been partitioned among the European powers. It has been conclusively demonstrated that national safety can not depend upon treaties of peace and arbitration. The ink was scarcely dry which fixed the signatures of Russia and Japan to The Hague arbitration treaty before they were in a terrific war to determine which should be the successful despoiler of large provinces belonging to the Chinese Empire. Italy was not restrained by her solemn pledge of peace and arbitration made to Turkey from seeking to enrich herself by the acquisition of Tripoli. No pledge made by Russia and Great Britain to Persia as a part of this treaty restrained them from dividing among themselves this helpless nation.

No, Mr. President, that nation is foolish to-day which trusts its national safety and independence to paper parchments. I hope the day will come when peace will dominate the world and national disputes will be determined by principles of equity and justice, promulgated by a properly constituted tribunal. But, sirs, that day is far distant.

Why, sirs, are all the first-class powers of the world rapidly and greatly increasing their naval armaments? Do these portend an era of peace and good will? Are battleships and Dreadnoughts the necessary concomitants of peace treaties? Can we be deluded into believing that these great battleships are being builded for the mere purpose of complimentary escorts to peace commissioners? Is Japan doubling her naval strength in a few years to emphasize her peace purposes and to give assurance that her ambitious designs are satisfied? Is the German Empire making prodigious expenditures for a great navy, with an immense naval policy of expansion, extending to 1917, for the mere purpose of show and parade and as a harmless plaything for the mailed hands of her imperial ruler?

Is Great Britain following a naval program, which gives her naval strength 10 per cent greater than that of two of the world's greatest naval powers, as a preliminary to the announcement of the universal policy of world's peace and arbitration? Has either of these three nations ever failed to acquire territory, extend their influence, or obtain commercial advantage when they could do so with safety and success? Is there anything in their past history to justify us in believing that if they are permitted to obtain naval supremacy unchallenged by other nations that they will unselfishly exercise this power for the betterment of the world? Are we foolish enough to believe that this Nation, which, with its vast wealth and unsurpassed possibilities, is the object of envy and jealousy of other nations, can be safe if we permit ourselves to become a fourth or fifth rate naval power? Are we simple-minded enough to risk our national safety to the chances of their mutual jealousies and enmities? Could this restrain each of them, when the destruction of our Navy would mean the overthrow of the Monroe doctrine and the opening up to them of Central and South America for the purpose of exploitation and spoliation? Has not one of these nations disputed the Monroe doctrine, and only needed a sufficient navy to challenge it? Do not we know that another of these has covetous eyes upon our Philippine possessions? Are we weak-minded enough to imagine that we can control the Panama Canal when completed for our own advantage and profit unless we possess naval strength sufficient to enforce our wishes? Are the benefits to be derived from our expenditure of $300,000,000 in this great enterprise to be weakly surrendered to the decision of arbitration tribunals or the direction of other nations of greater naval strength?

No, Mr. President, the time has not arrived for this Nation to abandon her policy of yearly increasing the naval power. The necessity for an adequate Navy is greater to-day to us than ever before in our history. It has been aptly said that the Monroe doctrine, the maintenance of which is indispensable to our national honor, prestige, and safety, is no stronger than is the American Navy. The Panama Canal, bringing to this Nation unequaled opportunities for commerce and trade, even if fortified, will remain under our control only so long as our Navy is sufficient to insure us its possession. Our vast foreign commerce, exceeding to-day that of any nation, is only secure when sustained by a sufficient Navy. The best protection to our colonial possessions and our long coast lines skirting the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans is our Navy. The future wars of this Nation will be either upon the seas or in foreign countries. Thus for the purpose of offensive or defensive warfare our surest safety lies in naval power. The future of this mighty Republic lies upon the seas. Failure there means national decadence and decay. Success there means national supremacy, power, and progress. The best guaranty for our peace and the peace of the world is a strong American Navy. It is the best insurance that we can provide against future loss or disaster. For this great Nation, rich in all material wealth, and far richer in future possibilities, to risk all to the hazards of wars and to become the prey of weaker nations merely for the lack of a sufficient naval strength is, to my mind, the supreme of national folly.

Mr. President, I would hail with pleasure an agreement among the first-class powers of the world to limit the expenditures for naval and military purposes. The advent of that day would bring untold blessings to all nations. The great sums of money now expended in armaments could then be utilized for other purposes far more beneficial. The burdens of taxes could then be lessened and industry and enterprise greatly relieved. I would be glad to see this Nation take a leading part for the successful consummation of this noble undertaking. But, sir, I am unwilling for this Nation to sit supinely idle while all the great nations of the world, our natural competitors, are rapidly and greatly increasing their naval armaments, and thus become helpless before their great naval power. Safety and self-interest alike demand that we should yearly increase our Navy sufficient to hold our present position as the second naval power of the world.

To-day our Navy is second only to that of Great Britain. I apprehend no differences with her. Great Britain has on this continent hostages which will prevent her from making aggressions upon us. Besides, ties of blood and the still stronger ties of self-interest involved in mutual profitable trade and commerce and uniformity of foreign policies almost insure the future peace of this Nation and Great Britain. But we should establish a policy, firmly to be adhered to, that no nation other than Great Britain shall possess naval strength superior to ours. This has been our declared policy in recent years. Our safety and success in the late Spanish War were largely due to this fact. No consideration of public policy now can justify us in abandoning this wise and farsighted purpose. We must recognize the fact that we are no longer an isolated and provincial Nation. We have become a great power of the world, with our rights and responsibilities. We should neither surrender the one nor shirk the other. To be prepared for each we must possess an adequate navy.

Mr. President, wars do not come now, as formerly, after years of protracted differences and ill will, but they come suddenly like summer storms, unheralded and unexpected. The advantages of quick, decisive action are now so great that in the future wars will come like lightning bolts from almost clear skies. Nations must be prepared in naval armaments if they are to have success upon the seas.

It takes practically three years to plan, construct, man, and commission a modern battleship. Hence it is impossible to create a navy after an emergency arises. Naval supremacy must be possessed at the beginning of a war, as it can never be acquired during its continuance. Japan's naval preparation enabled her to deliver the swift blows which prostrated Russia's great power. No protraction of the war would have enabled Russia to obtain supremacy in the oriental seas. No continuation of the war between Italy and Turkey will enable Turkey to construct a navy sufficient to dispute the seas with Italy. On the seas more than elsewhere is the old adage true, "In time of peace prepare for war."

Thus, Mr. President, it seems to me every consideration of national interest demands that we should have a well-mapped-out naval program to provide a Navy adequate for our purposes. Its policy should be fixed and adhered to. It should not be one year followed and another year abandoned. Affecting as it does our foreign policies and our national safety, it should not be the subject of partisan politics. It should be a broad, national policy, anchored in the patriotism of our people. To-day, as I have previously stated, we are the second naval power of the world, and we should continue firmly and without hesitation to occupy that position. Our national honor, prestige, and safety will not permit of less. If those nations who are competing with us for this position increase their navies we must equally increase ours. With our vast and varied interests, with our great responsibilities, with the present political complications in the world, we can not with safety afford to become a third or fourth rate naval power. When this occurs our vast foreign commercial interests, inseparable from national progress and prosperity, will be jeopardized. Our Philippine possessions will be the prey of superior naval power. Our foreign policies and intercourse will necessarily become timid and vacillating. The great affairs of the world, deeply affecting our interests, will be regulated without consultation with us. We will then become suppliants, pleading for rights instead of boldly and courageously demanding them. It will mean a surrender of the great prestige we have acquired in recent years. It will mean a distinct loss to the world of the great power at present possessed by this Nation for peace, justice, and liberty. It will mean that this Nation and our citizens will only obtain tolerance where they now receive the utmost respect.

The Monroe doctrine would possibly be challenged and our policy of controlling the Panama Canal disputed. It would mean that this mighty young Republic had retreated and ceased to advance along the pathway which was leading her to a higher and nobler destiny.

Mr. President, I shall support the naval program heretofore adopted, of constructing two battleships a year. This is absolutely necessary unless we purpose to surrender our present desirable position as the world's second naval power. The ships provided for at this time will not be available as a part of our Navy until 1915. If we provide for no battleships now, as proposed by many, in that year our Navy will be inferior to that of Germany. At that time Germany will have 41 battleships and be building 8, making a total of 49. We would only have 34 battleships and be building none, which would place our Navy practically at the mercy of the German Navy. At present we have 29 battleships and Germany has 29, but as a whole our ships are superior to those of Germany, thus making our Navy much stronger. Germany is at present building 12 battleships and we are building 6. The two navies will be practically equal in 1913, but in 1914, on account of the excess of battleships Germany is at present building, her navy will become superior to ours. That year Germany will have 37 battleships and we but 32. Thus, instead of reducing our Navy, it seems to me the better part of wisdom would be for us to do as Germany has done, and increase our general naval program to the extent that she has increased hers. Germany's naval program at present consists of building either two battleships or one battleship and one battle cruiser each year. We should make this our annual program. We should also add to our annual program such additional ships as Germany adds to hers. We will be compelled to do this if we are to maintain our present superior naval position. If we build no battleships for several years, our Navy will soon become inferior to that of Japan. This would be a great menace to us.

But, Mr. President, the present and annual increase of our Navy is most imperative from another consideration. Many of our present battleships will soon be useless for the purposes of naval warfare. The life of a battleship is limited to 20 years. This is occasioned not so much on account of the decay of the ship, but on account of the marked improvement of later battleships. The construction by Great Britain of a battleship of the Dreadnought type practically revolutionized the navies of the world. The conflict between Russia and Japan clearly demonstrated that the decisive factor in a naval engagement was not, as had been supposed, the 6-inch guns of a battleship, but it was the larger or 12-inch guns. The long range and effectiveness of the larger guns practically made the smaller ones useless. As soon as this truth was recognized Great Britain designed a new type of battleship, carrying the maximum number of 12-inch or larger guns to bear upon the broadside. This made one battleship of this type, on account of the long range of its guns and the weight and effectiveness of its shots, superior to several battleships of the old type. The superior advantages of larger guns having been fully recognized, battleships nowadays have as their principal armament guns 12, 13½, or 14 inches in caliber. The superiority of the larger guns can be fully appreciated when it is realized that a shell from a 12-inch gun weighs about 870 pounds, while a shell fired from a 13½ or 14 inch gun weighs 1,400 pounds, which makes a notable increase in weight and adds materially to the penetrating or smashing effect of a hit. The burster carried by a 12-inch shell weighs only 20 pounds, while that carried by a 14-inch shell weighs 30 pounds. That is to say, a 14-inch shell carries one-half more burster than a 12-inch shell, therefore its superiority of explosive effect is enormous. A 12-inch gun will penetrate 15-inch armor at 4,400 yards. A 14-inch gun will penetrate 18-inch armor at the same distance. A 12-inch gun will penetrate 12-inch armor at 7,700 yards, and a 14-inch gun will penetrate 15-inch armor at the same distance.

We thus see that a 14-inch gun will penetrate 15-inch armor at 7,700 yards which a 12-inch gun can only penetrate at a distance of 4,400 yards. Thus we can see how almost helpless a battleship armed with 12-inch guns would be in a conflict with a battleship armed with 14-inch guns. The one with smaller guns could be destroyed before it could get in effective shooting distance of the other. The great superiority of the new type of battleships over the older ones armed with 6-inch guns can be readily recognized when it is estimated that 1 explosive shell from even a 12-inch gun will do more damage than 100 shells from a 6-inch gun. The superiority of larger guns is further enhanced by the fact that they can shoot more accurately and effectively than the smaller ones. The superiority of this Dreadnought type of battleship over the former type is so great that naval strength to-day is practically measured by the possession of this character of capital battleships alone. The old type of battleship is now practically abandoned except as the reserve or second line of ships. The Dreadnought type of battleship, in addition, mounted the guns higher from the water, thereby giving a better command, better speed, and greater coal supply, thus enabling her to operate longer upon the sea and at a greater distance from home.

Another fact clearly demonstrated in the naval warfare between Russia and Japan was the great advantage which would accrue from high speed in a battleship. To obtain the advantage of this speed and also the larger guns, Great Britain constructed the battle cruiser of the Invincible type. This type far exceeds in speed the old type of battle cruiser, which, in addition to its larger guns, gives it an advantage over the old cruiser which can not be overestimated. Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Japan, Italy, and other nations are rapidly increasing their navies with these two types of battleships, recognizing that the old types are practically helpless before them. If we are to retain naval strength and power we must increase our Navy by building and adding to it these types of battleships. Unless we do this, in a few years a large part of our Navy will be useless and we will become powerless upon the seas. We should build each year one of these capital battleships and one of these battle cruisers, as recommended by the Navy Department. It is only by continuously pursuing this course that we can possess an adequate Navy and retain our naval prestige and power.

Mr. President, the best defense we can have for our immense line of coasts is a Navy. It is impossible to build forts or fortifications that can give adequate protection to our great stretch of coasts. Forts can only give protection to a very limited area. Besides, fortifications and forts are stationary and must await the attack of the enemy. If they are strong the enemy never approaches them. Forts and fortifications have never yet been decisive in warfare. A battleship, as effective in destructive power as a fort, can be carried where needed. It seeks and does not await the enemy. It goes where defense and protection are needed. America's safety from attack lies far more in an adequate Navy than in fortifications.

Thus, Mr. President, from whatever standpoint viewed, I am satisfied that the best interest of this Nation demands a continuance of our naval policy and the voting at this session of Congress of appropriations sufficient to construct two capital battleships or cruisers. Besides, both of the great political parties of this country are committed in their last national platforms to provide a strong and sufficient Navy. The Democratic Party, in its platform at Denver, made the following declaration:

> The constitutional provision that a Navy should be provided and maintained means an adequate Navy, and we believe that the interest of this country would be best served by having a Navy sufficient to defend the coasts of this country and protect American citizens wherever their rights may be in jeopardy.

Any thoughtful and informed person must be satisfied that in order to carry out the purposes so clearly specified in this platform it is absolutely necessary to continue our present naval policy. I believe in fulfilling platform promises and in carrying out the pledges made to the people in order to secure position and power; hence I purpose to vote for appropriations sufficient to give us a Navy adequate under all circumstances to defend and assert American rights.

In addition, Mr. President, our wealth, far exceeding that of any other nation, will fully justify this appropriation to furnish insurance for national safety. There are many wasteful expenditures of public money which can be safely stopped, and which will furnish more than ample funds necessary for this purpose.

Sirs, the American Navy has ever been the pride of our people. They have ever felt that it was their surest and safest defense. We gratefully remember how many difficulties and disasters we have averted in the past by our naval successes. Our debt of national gratitude to the Navy is great and lasting. In times of peace it surveys and charts the trackless sea; discovers and marks the dangers in the routes of commerce; makes researches for science and learning; stands as sentinels on the outposts of civilization; opens up for commerce new and hostile countries; and in every part of the world, by its activity and courage, it redresses American wrongs and asserts American rights. It is the best guardian of the interests of this great commercial people. In every country, in every clime, amid the frozen fields and ices of the North, under the blazing suns of the Tropics, naval officers and men have served and many died, unselfishly contributing to the prestige of this Nation and the glory and renown of its flag. In America's galaxy of greatness no names shine with more sparkling splendor than those of her naval heroes. It can be rightly said that the history of our Navy from the beginning has been "one blaze of glory, without a single blot of shame." Sirs, if this Nation is to attain the summit of her possible usefulness and greatness, it must come through her Navy—its power, its triumph, and its success. Prudence and wisdom demand that this Nation should have a great Navy properly to perform its responsible duties and successfully to achieve its great work. I rejoice at this Nation's proud and glorious past, but I rejoice still more at the cloudless future which beckons us on to a still greater greatness and a richer and deeper glory. With strong arms and brave hearts let us fearlessly face our great and responsible future. Let us not be deterred from our duty and destiny by those of our brethren who are frightened by their own prodigious shadow, projecting in the world's affairs, and who hesitate and shudder "through craven fear of being great."

Mr. President, I have here several tables prepared by the Office of Naval Intelligence of the Navy Department, showing the relative strength of the navies of the various nations of the world and the authorized increases of those navies for the next several years, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Supplementary table including both "Dreadnought" and "pre-Dreadnought" battleships.

[NOTE.—This table is included in order that the data requested may be complete. It should be noted, however, that nowadays comparisons of naval strength are generally based exclusively on Dreadnoughts; and every year this statement increases in force, as the pre-Dreadnought ships become obsolescent. Two or three years hence pre-Dreadnought ships will be entirely excluded from such comparisons.

[1] Battleships having a main battery of all big guns (11 inches or more caliber).
[2] Battleships, first class, are those of (about) 10,000 or more tons displacement.
[3] Includes smaller battleships and monitors.
[4] Armored cruisers having guns of largest caliber in main battery and capable of taking their place in line of battle with the battleships. They have an increase of speed at the expense of carrying fewer guns in main battery and a decrease in armor protection. Are also called battleship cruisers.
[5] Colonial vessels included.
[6] All unarmored war ships of more than 1,000 tons are, in this table, classed according to displacement as cruisers. Scouts are considered as cruisers in which battery and protection have been sacrificed to secure extreme speed. The word "protected" has been omitted because all cruisers except the smallest and oldest now have protective decks.

SEA STRENGTH DECEMBER 1, 1911.

In order to answer the frequent inquiries of societies and persons throughout the country interested in the maintenance of the Navy and its relative strength and importance in comparison with foreign navies, the following information has been compiled:

Vessels built.

NOTE.—Vessels undergoing trials are considered as completed. The following vessels are not included in the tables: Those over 20 years old unless they have been reconstructed and rearmed since 1905; transports, colliers, repair ships, converted merchant vessels, or any other auxiliaries; vessels of less than 1,000 tons, except torpedo craft; torpedo craft of less than 50 tons.

PORT OF INDIANA HARBOR, IND.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana for consideration of a very short bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16674) to establish a subport of entry and delivery at Indiana Harbor, in the State of Indiana.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield for a notice?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Vermont for that purpose.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to give notice that on Tuesday next, at the conclusion of the regular routine morning business, I shall move to take up for consideration the bill (S. 3) to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, and so forth. I expect, in doing that, that I shall have to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator should not confine it "to the Senator from Wyoming." He should say, "subject to consideration of appropriation bills," because there are other appropriation bills that will be in charge of other Senators.

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HILLSBORO, TEX.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WARREN. For what purpose?

Mr. CULBERSON. For the present consideration of a small bill.

Mr. WARREN. I do, unless it leads to some debate.

Mr. CULBERSON. If it should lead to debate, I will withdraw it.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. CULBERSON. With the indulgence of the Senator from Wyoming, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6918) increasing the cost of erecting a United States post-office building at Hillsboro, Tex.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that the limit of cost of $60,000 heretofore fixed for the erection of a United States post-office building at Hillsboro, Tex., be increased to $70,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that House bill 24023 be now proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was resumed at the top of page 53.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 53, line 1, after the word "chief," to strike out "$3,600" and insert "$4,000," and in line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out $15,720" and insert "$16,120," so as to make the clause read:

Secret Service Division: Chief, $4,000; assistant chief, who shall discharge the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; clerks—one of class four, one of class three, two of class two, one of class one, one at $1,000; assistant messenger; in all, $16,120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 8, after the word "assayer," to strike out $2,200" and insert "$2,400"; in line 9, before the words "of class one," to strike out "one" and insert "two"; and in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$25,580" and insert "$26,980," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Director of the Mint: Director, $5,000; examiner, $3,000; computer and adjuster of accounts, $2,500; assayer, $2,400; clerks—two of class four, two of class three, two of class one; private secretary, $1,400; messenger; assistant in laboratory, $1,200; assistant messenger; skilled laborer, $720; in all, $26,980.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 14, after the word "offices," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$25,000," so as to make the clause read:

For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $25,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill why it is necessary to increase that appropriation by $20,000?

Mr. WARREN. That is an appropriation which has usually been somewhere between $35,000 and $100,000. The department claims that a reduction to $5,000 for the freight, registered mail, and otherwise, would paralyze the movement of coin.

Mr. CULBERSON. What was the estimate?

Mr. WARREN. The estimate was, I think, $35,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. The House gave only $5,000, and in the bill as reported it is proposed to increase it by $20,000.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. I will say to the Senator that I presume they need $35,000 to $50,000, but $25,000 would, in the opinion of the committee, carry them over until we can see later in the year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 18, after the word "including," to strike out "text books on metallurgical processes" and insert "books, pamphlets, periodicals, specimens of coins, ores, and incidentals," and in line 20, after the word "incidentals," to strike out "$600" and insert "$800," so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the Bureau of the Mint, to be expended under the direction of the director, namely: For assay laboratory chemicals, fuel, materials, balances, weights, and other necessaries, including books, pamphlets, periodicals, specimens of coins, ores, and incidentals, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 23, after the word "examinations," to insert "and for the collection of statistics relative to the annual production and consumption of the precious metals in the United States"; and on page 54, line 1, after the words "United States," to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$4,000," so as to make the clause read:

For examinations of mints, expense in visiting mints for the purpose of superintending the annual settlements, and for special examinations, and for the collection of statistics relative to the annual production and consumption of the precious metals in the United States, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 2, to strike out:

For books, pamphlets, periodicals, specimens of coins, ores, and incidentals, $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 4, to strike out:

For the collection of statistics relative to the annual production and consumption of the precious metals in the United States, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 22, after the word "newspapers," to insert "newspaper clippings," and in line 24, after the word "department," to strike out "$750" and insert "$1,000," so as to make the clause read:

For newspapers, newspaper clippings, law books, city directories, and other books of reference relating to the business of the department, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 7, to increase the appropriation for investigation and experimentation and to secure better methods of administration, with a view to increased efficiency or to greater economy in the expenditure of public money, etc., from $15,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, after line 10, to strike out:

For purchase and exchange of horses and wagons, for office and mail service, to be used only for official purposes, care and subsistence of horses, including shoeing, and of wagons, harness, and repairs of the same, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, after line 14, to insert:

For purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor trucks, and maintenance of horses and carriages, to be used for official purposes only, $8,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the chairman that I think it would be well to insert the word "exchange" after the word "purchase," so as to read: "For purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of motor trucks." In the District of Columbia we have found that to be very desirable.

Mr. WARREN. The suggestion is a good one, and I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "exchange" after the word "purchase."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 18, after the word "cases," to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$6,000," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of file holders and file cases, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 12, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$100" and insert "$250," so as to read:

For washing and hemming towels, for the purchase of awnings and fixtures, window shades and fixtures, alcohol, benzine, turpentine, varnish, baskets, belting, bellows, bowls, brooms, buckets, brushes, canvas, crash, cloth, chamois skins, cotton waste, door and window fasteners, dusters; flower-garden, street, and engine hose; lace leather, lye, nails, oils, plants, picks, pitchers, powders, stencil plates, hand stamps and repairs of same, stamp ink, spittoons, soap, matches, match safes, sponges, tacks, traps, thermometers, toilet paper, tools, towels, towel racks, tumblers, wire, zinc, and for blacksmithing, repairs of machinery, removal of rubbish, sharpening tools, street-car tickets not exceeding $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 12, after the word "fire-alarm," to strike out "system" and insert "systems"; and in line 13, before the word "in," to strike out "now," so as to make the clause read:

For maintenance of the automatic fire-alarm systems in the Treasury and Winder Buildings, $2,166.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Collecting internal revenue," on page 59, line 21, after the words "internal-revenue offices," to strike out "$2,075,000" and insert "$2,200,000," so as to read:

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, and deputy collectors, and surveyors, and clerks, messengers, and janitors in internal-revenue offices, $2,200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 3, to strike out:

On and after July 1, 1912, the whole number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and the whole number of collectors of internal revenue shall not exceed 62.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was called out of the Chamber a moment ago. Will the Senator in charge of the bill turn back to page 56? I do not recall why that item for purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor trucks and maintenance of horses and carriages to be used for official purposes only, was increased by $4,500, from $3,500 to $8,000.

Mr. WARREN. What was the observation of the Senator?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not recall why that sum on page 56, lines 15, 16, and 17, was increased over the House appropriation of $3,500 by $4,500, totaling $8,000. It seems to me that is an unusual increase for horse hire.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice that in cutting out the horses there is installed in place, "for purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of motor trucks, and maintenance of horses and wagons, to be used for official purposes only, $8,000." Naturally, the buying of new motor trucks would increase the cost for one year.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Treasury Department say that it will be a saving in the end.

Mr. WARREN. I have a letter here from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. MacVeagh, if the Senator would like to have it read at the desk. It explains another feature of the matter.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it a short letter?

Mr. WARREN. It covers a couple of pages.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 24, 1912.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

SIR: I wish to present for the consideration of your committee an estimate for motor trucks for freight hauling for the Treasury Department.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill now before your committee carries an item of $3,500 under "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department, horses, wagons, etc." This is the usual appropriation made for the purpose of maintaining the Treasury stable.

Since the estimates went in an epidemic disease amongst horses has prevailed, and 3 of the 10 Treasury horses have died and 3 others are now sick with the disease. This fact makes it necessary for the department to ask Congress either to increase the regular appropriation for the stable, in order to purchase additional horses, or to change the system of freight handling by making an appropriation for the purchase of motor trucks.

It requires three freight wagons and a mail wagon, operated by horses, to handle the freight business of the Treasury Department. Careful investigation indicates that two motor trucks, one with a capacity of 1½ tons and one with a capacity of 1,500 pounds, and a light motor delivery wagon for mail service, will do the work.

These three motor trucks will cost, approximately, $5,700. This estimate is made after a careful inquiry as to prices. The repairs, oil, and fuel to operate the trucks will require $1,200 for the year, making the total appropriation required for these three motors $6,900.

If this plan is adopted, the appropriation now in the bill of $3,500 under "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department, horses, wagons, etc.," should be reduced to $1,200, which amount will be required for the maintenance of the horses and carriages provided for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The annual appropriation for succeeding years for the Treasury stable, if the plan proposed should be adopted, would amount to $2,400 instead of $3,500. This amount would provide for the operation of the motor trucks and for the maintenance of the horses and carriage for the Secretary.

Should Congress not see fit to make the appropriation for the motor trucks, the death of the horses since the submission of the estimates makes it necessary for the submission of an additional estimate of $1,000 to replace the horses which have died, making the appropriation under this heading $4,500 instead of $3,500.

If the motor trucks are provided as suggested, the appropriation should read "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department; for purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor trucks and maintenance of horses and carriages, $8,100."

Respectfully, FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that this epidemic in horses has become evident in other places and we have had to meet it, but it is a plain case of economy to change from horses to these motor trucks. For this one year the expense will be higher, but after this year the expense will be less than ever before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 25, after the date "1909," to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$175,000," so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of collecting the corporation tax authorized by the tariff act approved August 5, 1909, $175,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 18, page 61, "Office of assistant treasurer at Boston."

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee why the paying teller, clerk, and vault clerk in the office of the subtreasury at Boston have been cut down from their existing salaries. I have been looking through all the salaries, and they are of different amounts in different places. Those are men occupying responsible positions, and I happen to know that they are men who have been there many years. I do not know why their salaries should have been cut down.

Mr. WARREN. The Treasury Department, as the Senator perhaps knows, has for the last two or three years—in fact, since Mr. MacVeagh took charge of it—had committees of investigation, and so forth, with the idea of reducing the expenses of the department and increasing the efficiency. Last year the Secretary of the Treasury was able to give us a reduction of something like $200,000 to $250,000, as my memory goes, and this year there is another large cut in the expenses of the Treasury Department. He has gone over in his estimates all the independent treasuries and has graded the salaries as the Senator sees them in the estimates. The committee in looking over the matter of the Boston subtreasury made three or four amendments, as the Senator will see.

Mr. LODGE. I see.

Mr. WARREN. But we could not raise the salaries of the officers the Senator alludes to without exceeding the estimates.

Mr. LODGE. I observe, however, with some interest, that the decreases have all been indicated at places other than Chicago.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to ask if that has any personal significance?

Mr. LODGE. I notice that some of them are changed—Cincinnati is changed, New York is changed—but I notice that persons in the office at Chicago have their salaries unchanged, which I think is very appropriate. I do not quarrel with that at all.

Mr. CULLOM. I agree with that. I have a special communication. I should like to see the salaries at Chicago raised to more than they are receiving.

Mr. WARREN. There is possibly not a single independent treasury where some Senator does not want a raise.

Mr. LODGE. I do not ask that the salaries be raised; I simply ask that the existing salaries be retained.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice some increases at Boston.

Mr. LODGE. Those increases I do not know anything about. They are not asked for as far as I know. The reductions are in the salary of the paying teller, from $2,500 to $2,250; the clerk, from $2,250 to $2,000; the vault clerk, from $2,000 to $1,800. They cut down the most important, the most responsible, people and they seem to have raised the salary of one teller, and they have added somewhat. They have raised some of the clerks $100 who occupy a less responsible position. It seems to me that it is rather hard to pick out the most responsible men who have been there many years and seize this time to cut down their salaries.

At the proper time I shall offer amendments to restore the salaries.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask if there has been any change in the business of the subtreasury there. Is it less than it formerly was or more?

Mr. LODGE. It is more. I have not compared it with the others, but the business certainly has not fallen off.

Mr. WARREN. The inquiry made by the committee of the Treasury Department elicited the information that all of these have been carefully weighed as to the business they were doing and the salary arranged accordingly. That is the information we got from the department.

Mr. LODGE. The population has increased chiefly in the neighborhood of Boston last year from twenty-eight hundred thousand to three million and nearly six hundred thousand, and the increase in population suggests that the business of the Treasury has increased, as all other business has increased.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator does not wish to offer an amendment now.

Mr. LODGE. No; I shall not offer it now.

Mr. CULBERSON. I invite the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that there is nothing in the bill to indicate a lowering of the salary. I presume, therefore, he speaks from personal information.

Mr. LODGE. I speak from personal information, having compared the figures with last year. The reductions were made in the House and, of course, do not appear on the face of their bill.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that I have here a copy of the bill on which those changes are marked, and at any time any Senator can be informed by inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. These are Treasury changes, as the chairman says.

Mr. CULBERSON. These were changes made in the House on the recommendation of the Treasury Department, I understand.

Mr. LODGE. They were.

Mr. WARREN. As to some of them, and wherever the House has changed it it has been lowered. The committee of the Senate, I think, has pretty generally, where they were lower, taken them up to the estimates; but they have been rather careful about exceeding the estimates.

Mr. CULBERSON. But in the particular referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts they are under the estimates.

Mr. LODGE. They are suggested by the Treasury Department.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it seems to be difficult to get a hearing here unless one violates the rules of the Senate. The Senator from Wyoming made the statement that in all the States the request has been made for the raising of the salaries of the clerks and other employees in the assistant treasurer's office. Has that kind of a request been made by the California Senators?

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps I spoke rather generally when I said all, but if not California it would be an exception. I should be only too glad to know it, if that is the case, because I thought we had heard from all.

Mr. WORKS. My colleague may have said something about it, but I am sure I have not.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's colleague took up the matter with me about the subtreasury and the mint and assay office. We have reduced quite a little as to one or two of those institutions, because after the Treasury Department had made up its estimate and after the House had acted upon the bill in committee the House itself in session overruled the committee and reinserted the assay offices, and so we had to divide again and deduct from the mint and take it back to the assay office.

Mr. WORKS. I only want it understood that I have not asked for any increase in these matters. I do not want San Francisco to be discriminated against, however; I want the employees there to have their fair salaries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Independent Treasury," on page 61, line 21, after the words "redemption teller," to strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,800"; in line 22, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 23, after the word "each," to strike out "one clerk" and insert "three clerks"; in line 24, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eight" and insert "five"; in the same line, after the word "clerk," to strike out "$800" and insert "$900"; in the same line, after the words "chief guard," to strike out "$1,060" and insert "$1,100"; and in line 26, after the words "in all," to strike out "$45,950" and insert "$46,590," so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at Boston: Assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,250; clerk, $2,000; vault clerk, $1,800; receiving teller, $2,000; redemption teller, $1,800; five clerks, at $1,600 each; clerk, $1,500; one clerk, $1,400; four clerks, at $1,200 each; three clerks, $1,100; five clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk, $900; chief guard, $1,100; three watchmen, at $840 each; laborer and guard, $720; in all, $46,590.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Just in this connection I had not looked at the precise recommendations of the Treasury. I observe that at Chicago—I suppose it is a mere accident—nothing but increases are recommended. The House did not adopt them, but they are recommended and all the decreases are recommended in other subtreasuries.

Mr. CULLOM. By whom recommended?

Mr. LODGE. Recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I simply call attention to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 12, after the words "paying teller," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000"; in line 13, after the words "receiving teller," to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800"; in line 16, after the word "stenographer," to strike out "$720" and insert "$1,000"; and in line 17, after the words "in all," to strike out "$27,010" and insert "$27,790," so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at Cincinnati: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $1,800; four clerks, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $1,300 each; vault clerk, $1,800; bookkeeper, $1,800; clerk, $1,200; two clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk and stenographer, $1,000; chief watchman, $840; two watchmen, at $600 each; in all, $27,790.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 21, after the words "receiving teller," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000"; in line 22, after the word "clerk," to strike out "$1,400" and insert "$1,500"; and in line 25, after the words "in all," to strike out "$28,590" and insert "$28,890," so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at New Orleans: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; vault clerk, $1,800; bookkeeper, $1,500; clerk, $1,500; assorting teller, $1,200; 6 clerks, at $1,200 each; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; typewriter and stenographer, $1,000; day watchman, $720; night watchman, $720; messenger, $500; in all, $28,890

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 3, after the word "cashier," to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$4,200"; in line 8, after the word "division," to strike out "$2,700" and insert "$2,800"; in line 11, after the word "division," to strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,500"; in line 13, after the word "division," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,700"; in line 16, after the word "teller," to strike out "$2,100" and insert "$2,250"; in line 17, after the word "teller," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250"; in line 18, after the word "teller," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,100"; and in line 24, after the word "teller," to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800," so as to read:

Office of assistant treasurer at New York: Assistant treasurer, $8,000; cashier (formerly deputy assistant treasurer and cashier), $4,200; assistant cashier (formerly assistant cashier and chief clerk), $3,600; chief of check pay division (formerly assistant cashier and vault clerk), $3,000; bond clerk and assistant vault clerk (formerly chief of division), $2,800; paying teller (formerly chief of division), $3,000; receiving teller (formerly chief of division), $2,800; chief of redemption division (formerly chief of division), $2,700; vault and authorities clerk (formerly chief of division), $2,500; chief clerk (formerly chief paying teller), $3,000; chief of coin division (formerly chief of division), $2,700; chief bookkeeper, $2,400; assistant chief of canceled check division (formerly assistant teller), $2,250; assistant chief of redemption division (formerly assistant teller), $2,250; assistant paying teller (formerly assistant teller), $2,250; paying teller, coin division (formerly assistant teller), $2,100; assistant chief, check pay division (formerly assistant teller), $2,000; assistant chief, coin division (formerly assistant teller), $2,000; chief of minor coin division (formerly assistant teller), $2,000; 4 bookkeepers (formerly assistant tellers), at $2,000 each; paying teller, minor coin division (formerly assistant teller), $1,800; assistant receiving teller (formerly assistant teller), $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the assistant treasurer at New York, on page 64, line 1, after the word "clerks," to strike out "two (formerly one assistant teller and one chief of division), at $2,100 each" and insert "one at $2,300, one at $2,100, three at $2,000 each"; in line 4, before the word "formerly," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 6, after the sum "$1,700," to strike out "eight" and insert "six"; in line 7, before the words "at $1,600 each," to strike out "(formerly seven assistant tellers and one clerk)"; in line 7, after the word "each," to strike out "six" and insert "nine"; in line 8, before the words "at $1,500 each," to strike out "(formerly four assistant tellers and two clerks)"; in line 8, after the word "each," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "thirteen"; in line 9, before the words "at $1,400 each," to strike out "(formerly thirteen assistant tellers and three clerks)"; in line 10, after the word "each," to strike out "three" and insert "eight"; in line 11, before the words "at $1,300 each," to strike out "(formerly two assistant tellers and one clerk)"; in line 11, after the word "each," to strike out "eleven" and insert "fourteen"; in line 12, before the words "at $1,200 each," to strike out "(formerly eight assistant tellers and three clerks)"; in line 12, after the word "each," to strike out "nine" and insert "five"; in line 13, before the words "at $1,100 each," to strike out "(formerly eight assistant tellers and one clerk)"; in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "ten" and insert "five"; in line 15, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "(formerly eight assistant tellers and two clerks)"; in line 20, before the words "two engineers," to strike out "$1,050" and insert "$1,200"; and in line 21, after the words "in all," to strike out "$185,260" and insert "$192,610," so as to read:

Clerks—1 at $2,300, 1 at $2,100, 3 at $2,000 each, 1 (formerly assistant teller), $1,900, 3 (formerly assistant tellers), at $1,800 each, 1 (formerly assistant teller), $1,700, 6 at $1,600 each, 9 at $1,500 each; 13 at $1,400 each; 8 at $1,300 each; 14 at $1,200 each; 5 at $1,100 each; 5 at $1,000 each; messengers—2 at $1,200 each, 5 at $900 each, 2 at $800 each; chief guard (formerly chief detective), $1,500; guard (formerly assistant detective), $1,200; 2 guards (formerly 2 hall men), at $1,000 each; superintendent of building, $1,800; chief engineer (formerly engineer), $1,200; 2 engineers, at $1,050 each; 8 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $192,610.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask if the changes proposed there by the committee are recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. WARREN. It seems that in the early estimates that were called for by the House they did not complete as they intended the New York estimate, and when completed it showed a difference. I do not have the figures at this moment, but the difference amounted to several thousand dollars, which we were asked to add to the estimate, and we did so.

Mr. CULBERSON. This is a subsequent estimate by the Treasury Department?

Mr. WARREN. It is subsequent information and it makes a difference of a few thousand dollars.

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice that generally speaking I believe the chairman has stated that the bill as passed by the House follows the recommendation of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WARREN. I think the House intended to follow it.

Mr. CULBERSON. But these increases in the office of the assistant treasurer at New York amount to about $7,500.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will remember I said that the House endeavored to follow pretty generally the estimates, but in some cases fell below.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 25, after the word "others," to strike out "$9,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

For paper for interest, transfer, redemption, pension, and other checks and drafts for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurers, pension agents, disbursing officers, and others, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Mints and assay offices," on page 66, line 18, after the word "assayer," to strike out "melter and refiner" and insert "superintendent melting and refining department," and in line 19, after the word "and," to strike out "coiner" and insert "superintendent coining department," so as to read:

Mint at San Francisco, Cal.: Superintendent, $4,500; assayer, superintendent melting and refining department, and superintendent coining department, at $3,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 3, after the word "employees," to strike out "$155,000" and insert "$122,500," so as to make the clause read:

For wages of workmen and other employees, $122,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 18, after the word "melter," to strike out "$1,400" and insert "$1,500," so as to make the clause read:

Assay office at Charlotte, N. C.: Assayer and melter, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 19, after the word "employees," to strike out "$750" and insert "$900," so as to make the clause read:

For wages of workmen and other clerks and employees, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 21, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$400" and insert "$500," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental and contingent expenses, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 23, after the word "melter," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250," and in line 25, after words "in all," to strike out "$6,200" and insert "$6,450," so as to make the clause read:

Assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak.: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,250; clerk, $1,200; assistant assayer, $1,600; assayer's assistant, $1,400; in all, $6,450.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, after line 10, to insert:

Assay office at St. Louis, Mo.: Assayer in charge, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, after line 12, to insert:

For wages of workmen (including janitor), $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, after line 13, to insert:

For incidental and contingent expenses, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 5, after the word "employees," to strike out "$112,000" and insert "$94,000."

For wages of workmen and other employees, $94,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 11, after the word "coin," to strike out "$37,500" and insert "$35,000," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including new machinery and repairs, wastage in melting and refining department and coining department, and loss on sale of sweeps arising from the treatment of bullion and the manufacture of coin, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the end of line 24, on page 71, as follows:

District of Alaska: Governor, $7,000; 4 judges, at $7,500 each; 4 attorneys, at $5,000 each; 4 marshals, at $4,000 each; 4 clerks, at $3,500 each; in all, $87,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the chairman of the committee, purely for information, why it is that there is a secretary to the governor in Hawaii and none to the governor in Alaska and why it is that the judges in Hawaii are paid so much less than are the judges in Alaska?

Mr. WARREN. As to the secretary in Alaska, I will say that the surveyor general and the secretary are one; that is, the surveyor general is ex officio secretary, and performs the duty of secretary in that district, that not being a Territory proper. That covers one point raised.

As to the difference in salary between the judges and governor, the Senator from Iowa could well go further, and ask why the salary of the governors of New Mexico and Arizona should be $3,000, while the salary of the governors of Alaska and Hawaii is $7,000. Those inequalities have crept in through legislation which has been had from time to time. Where there is legislation outside of an appropriation bill which provides the office and the salary, the committee, of course, follow the law. It has been thought, I presume, that Alaska was a more difficult country to handle and not so pleasant, and a more expensive country to live in than Hawaii.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, is there not another reason? Are not the expenses of living at least two or three or four times higher in Alaska than they are in any place in the United States proper?

Mr. WARREN. I think they are much higher.

Mr. McCUMBER. Unless there is a great change, the expenses would be at least double what they would be in the States.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think that would apply to Hawaii probably.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was speaking of Alaska.

Mr. CUMMINS. My inquiry arose because we pay the governor of Alaska the same salary that we pay the governor of Hawaii, and we pay the chief justice of Hawaii $6,000, while we pay each one of the judges in Alaska $7,500. The matter of the high cost of living can not account for both these things.

Mr. WARREN. I think on reflection the Senator from Iowa will see the difference. Alaska is an immense country in area, and the districts these judges have to cover require an immense amount of travel and expense going to and coming from. I do not think the difference in salary there is at all out of the way, because, while the governor may live at one point, the judges are compelled to be at different points in the interior of the Territory; and when we remember that the exact center of the United States from east to west is out in the Pacific Ocean opposite Portland, it will give a little idea of the extent in area of Alaska.

Mr. CUMMINS. Do the judges under the general law receive traveling expenses when away from home and subsistence also?

Mr. WARREN. No; they have no traveling expenses to go from here to Alaska and to their place of holding court.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not as far from here to Alaska as it is to Hawaii.

Mr. WARREN. They are not judges who are traveling from place to place to hold court; but whenever they get into the country and get out they have to cover immense distances with only primitive means and modes of transportation.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is farther to Hawaii than it is to Alaska.

Mr. WARREN. That may be true; but when you get to Hawaii there is a very different state of affairs, and, besides, the route is provided with cheap and comfortable transportation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only wanted to know whether the committee had given consideration to that disparity.

Mr. WARREN. The committee was fully advised. These matters are largely governed by existing law. For instance, the law under which the Territory of Hawaii was organized controls the salaries of officers in that Territory. When we passed the law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor I made the complaint at the time that we were placing the salaries in the Department of Commerce and Labor away out of line as compared with the salaries in other departments. Some of them have been since lowered, but it is true that there is this inequality as a matter of statute law now.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Government in the Territories," on page 72, line 2, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$4,050," and in line 6, after the word "governor," to strike out "$7,150" and insert "$8,950," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental and contingent expenses, clerk hire, not to exceed $4,050; janitor service, not to exceed $900; traveling expenses of the governor while absent from Juneau on official business; rent of offices and quarters in Juneau, stationery, lights, and fuel, to be expended under the direction of the governor, $8,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 16, after the sum "$2,000," to insert "for traveling expenses of the governor while absent from the capital on official business, $500," and in line 17, after the words "in all," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500," so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the Territory of Hawaii, to be expended by the governor for stationery, postage, and incidentals, $1,000, and for private secretary to the governor, $2,000; for traveling expenses of the governor while absent from the capital on official business, $500; in all, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "War Department," on page 73, after line 5, to strike out:

On or before the 30th day of June, 1912, the Secretary of War shall cause a reorganization to be made of the clerical and other office force of the War Department, herein provided for, so as to reduce the whole number of said force not less than 10 per cent, and the salaries or compensation of all places herein provided for in said department that may be embraced within such reduction shall not be available for expenditure, but shall lapse and be covered into the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 17, after the word "Secretary," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,000"; in line 18, after the word "Secretary," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000"; in line 21, before the words "disbursing clerk," to strike out "clerk to the assistant and chief clerk, $2,100," and insert "assistant chief clerk, $2,400"; on page 74, line 1, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 3, before the words "chief messenger," to strike out "carpenter, $1,000," and insert "foreman carpenter, $1,200"; and in line 12, after the words "in all," to strike out "$147,970" and insert "$150,020," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of War, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; assistant and chief clerk, $4,000; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary, $2,000; stenographer to the Secretary, $2,000; clerk to the Assistant Secretary, $2,400; assistant chief clerk, $2,400; disbursing clerk, $2,750; appointment clerk, $2,250; 4 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; superintendent of buildings outside of State, War, and Navy Department Building, in addition to compensation as chief of division, $500; chief telegrapher, $1,800; clerks—4 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 15 of class 2, 19 of class 1, 6 at $1,000 each, 1 at $900; foreman, $1,200; foreman carpenter, $1,200; chief messenger, $1,000; carpenter, $900; skilled laborer, $900; 6 messengers; 7 assistant messengers; telephone switchboard operator, assistant telephone switchboard operator; 2 messenger boys, at $360 each; engineer, $900; assistant engineer, $720; fireman; 4 watchmen; 5 watchmen, at $660 each; 8 laborers; 2 laborers, at $540 each; hostler, $600; 2 hostlers and 1 watchman, at $540 each; elevator conductors—1 at $600, 1 at $540; 4 charwomen; in all, $150,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 74, line 21, after the sum "$781,950," to strike out "all employees provided for by this paragraph for the Adjutant General's Office of the War Department shall be exclusively engaged on the work of this office for the fiscal year 1913," so as to make the clause read:

Adjutant General's Office: Chief clerk, $2,000; 10 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; clerks—48 of class 4, 64 of class 3, 94 of class 2, 232 of class 1, 88 at $1,000 each; engineer, $1,400; assistant engineer, $900; 2 firemen; skilled mechanic, $1,000; 10 messengers; 58 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $360; 8 watchmen; superintendent of building, $250; and 18 laborers; in all, $781,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 75, line 6, after the word "solicitor," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,750"; in line 7, before the word "clerks," to insert "law clerks—one at $2,400, one at $2,000"; in line 8, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; and in line 9, after the words "in all," to strike out "$20,800" and insert "$26,850," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Judge Advocate General: Chief clerk and solicitor, $2,750; law clerks—1 at $2,400, 1 at $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 6 of class 1; copyist; 2 messengers; assistant messenger; in all, $26,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 76, to insert:

The services of one wireless engineer and one wireless assistant, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, may be employed only in the Signal Office to carry into effect the appropriation for the Signal Service of the Army, to be paid from such appropriation, in addition to the foregoing employees appropriated for in the Signal Office: Provided, That the entire expenditures for this purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shall not exceed $3,600, and that the Secretary of War shall each year in the annual estimates report to Congress the number of persons so employed, their duties, and the amount paid to each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 14, after the word "clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,500"; and on page 77, line 3, after the words "in all," to strike out "$275,110" and insert "$275,610," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Quartermaster General: Chief clerk, $2,500; 2 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; clerks—9 of class 4, 14 of class 3, 27 of class 2, 58 of class 1, 40 at $1,000 each, 13 at $900 each; advisory architect, $4,000; experienced builder and mechanic, $2,500; inspector of supplies, $2,500; draftsmen—3 at $1,800 each, 7 at $1,600 each, 5 at $1,400 each, 1 at $1,200; supervising engineer, $2,750; 2 civil engineers, at $1,800 each; assistant civil engineer, $1,200; electrical engineer, $2,000; electrical and mechanical engineer, $2,000; marine engineer, $3,500; assistant marine engineer, $1,800; sanitary and heating engineer, $1,800; blue-print operator, $900; 4 messengers; 11 assistant messengers; 2 assistant messengers, at $600 each; female messenger, $480; 7 laborers; laborer, $480; in all, $275,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

Office of the Commissary General: Chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—6 of class 4, 8 of class 3, 8 of class 2, 18 of class 1, 13 at $1,000 each, 4 at $900 each; messenger; 2 assistant messengers; laborer; in all, $77,940.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that if the Army bill should pass, these two departments would be consolidated, in which case there would be a change there and there would be probably some reduction in the number of those clerks.

Mr. WARREN. There would undoubtedly be an elimination of some of them.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 77, line 12, before the words "of class one," to strike out "thirty-two" and insert "thirty-four"; and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$166,108" and insert "$168,508," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Surgeon General: Chief clerk, $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; clerks—13 of class 4, 11 of class 3, 26 of class 2, 34 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; anatomist, $1,600; engineer, $1,400; 3 firemen; skilled mechanic, $1,000; 2 messengers; 10 assistant messengers; 3 watchmen; superintendent of building (Army Medical Museum and Library), $250; 6 laborers; chemist, $2,088; assistant chemist, $1,500; principal assistant librarian, $2,250; pathologist, $1,800; microscopist, $1,800; assistant librarian, $1,800; 4 charwomen; in all, $168,508.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 21, after the words "Chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250"; and in line 25, after the words "in all," to strike out "$71,900" and insert "$72,150," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Paymaster General: Chief clerk, $2,250; clerks—6 of class 4, 7 of class 3, 12 of class 2, 11 of class 1, 5 at $1,000 each, 9 at $900 each; messenger; assistant messenger; four laborers; laborer, $600; in all, $72,150.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 78, line 24, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "twelve" and insert "fourteen"; in the same line, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "seventeen"; in the same line, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "nine" and insert "eleven"; and on page 79, line 1, after the words "in all," to strike out "$100,220" and insert "$107,420," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Chief of Engineers: Chief clerk, $2,000; two chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each; clerks—8 of class 4, 11 of class 3, 14 of class 2, 17 of class 1, 11 at $1,000 each, 11 at $900 each; 6 messengers; 3 assistant messengers; and 2 laborers; in all, $107,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, line 10, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$40,000" and insert "$42,000," so as to make the clause read:

And the services of skilled draftsmen, civil engineers, and such other services as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, may be employed only in the office of the Chief of Engineers, to carry into effect the various appropriations for rivers and harbors, fortifications, and surveys, to be paid from such appropriations: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1913 shall not exceed $42,000; and that the Secretary of War shall each year, in the annual estimates, report to Congress the number of persons so employed, their duties, and the amount paid to each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, line 16, before the words "of class three," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 17, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "eighteen" and insert "seventeen"; in the same line, before the word "messengers," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 18, before the word "messengers," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$91,000" and insert "$93,160," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Bureau of Insular Affairs: Law officer, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—10 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 10 of class 2, 19 of class 1, 17 at $1,000 each; 3 messengers; 3 assistant messengers; five laborers; two charwomen; in all, $93,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, line 25, before the words "of class 4," to strike out "two" and insert "three," and on page 80, line 3, after the words "in all," to strike out "$34,160" and insert "$35,960," so as to make the clause read:

Division of Militia Affairs, Office of the Chief of Staff: For the following now authorized by section 20 of the act approved January 21, 1903, as amended by the act approved May 27, 1908, namely: Chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—3 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 9 of class 1, 7 at $1,000 each; messenger; 1 assistant messenger; 2 laborers; 2 charwomen; in all, $35,960.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Contingent expenses of the War Department," on page 81, line 4, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$100" and insert "$300," so as to read:

Street car tickets, not exceeding $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Public buildings and grounds," on page 83, after line 16, to insert:

For purchase of steel cases for old records in Office of Public Buildings and Grounds, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 20, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$32,875" and insert "$33,275," so as to make the clause read:

Of the foregoing amounts appropriated under Public Buildings and Grounds, the sum of $33,275 shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "State, War, and Navy Department Building," on page 83, line 23, after the words "of class three," to strike out "stenographer and typewriter, $900," and insert "two stenographers and typewriters, at $900 each."

Mr. WARREN. On behalf of the committee, I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment is rejected.

Mr. WARREN. Now, after "$900," in line 24, I move to insert the words "one typewriter, $900."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 84, line 4, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "forty" and insert "forty-nine."

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice the amendment in line 4, on page 84, increases the number of watchmen in the State, War, and Navy Department Building. Is that the old question we have had up about the number of watchmen necessary on account of the old soldiers being employed, and so forth?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. If it is, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. WARREN. I imagine all of those cases grew more or less out of the reduction made in the case of the Capitol police.

The House, rather consistently, have reduced the number of watchmen in nearly all the departments. The evidence we have from those in charge is that it is impossible properly to guard the property, to prevent people carrying away things, to keep improper parties from getting in, and to afford protection from fire, without an adequate force, and we thought it unsafe to reduce the number lower than the figure we have inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amenment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 84, line 7, before the word "foreman," to strike out "messenger," and in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$105,960" and insert "$112,500," so as to make the clause read:

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Office of the superintendent: Clerk of class 3; stenographer and typewriter, $900; 1 typewriter, $900; chief engineer, $1,400; 5 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; electrical machinist, $1,200; captain of the watch, $1,200; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $840 each; 49 watchmen; carpenter, $1,000; electrician, $1,200; machinist, painter, and plumber, at $1,000 each; 3 dynamo tenders, at $900 each; 7 skilled laborers or mechanics, at $840 each; foreman of laborers, $840; 10 firemen; 11 conductors of elevators, at $720 each; 17 laborers; 3 second-class firemen, at $660 each; 4 forewomen of charwomen, at $300 each; 77 charwomen; gardener, $720; in all, $112,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Navy Department," on page 85, line 7, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "one" and insert "three"; in the same line, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 8, before the word "four," to strike out "one at $1,100"; in line 9, after the words "telegraph operator," to strike out "$1,100" and insert "$1,300"; and in line 14, after the words "in all," to strike out "$73,460" and insert "$77,160," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of the Navy, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of the Navy, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,000; private secretary to Secretary, $2,500; clerk to Secretary, $2,250; clerk to Assistant Secretary, $2,000; disbursing clerk, $2,250; stenographer, $1,800; clerks—4 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 4 at $1,000 each; stenographer, $1,200; telegraph operator, $1,300; 2 copyists; carpenter, $900; 4 messengers; 4 assistant messengers; 3 laborers; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each; messenger boy, $420; messenger boy, $400; telephone switchboard operator; assistant telephone switchboard operator; in all, $77,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 86, line 3, after the sum "$17,640," to strike out "all employees provided for by this paragraph shall be exclusively engaged on the work of this office during the fiscal year 1913," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Naval Records of the Rebellion: Chief clerk, $2,000; agent, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy from the officers of the late Confederate Navy, $1,800; clerks—1 of class 3 (indexer), 3 of class 2, 3 of class 1, 2 at $1,000 each; copyist; copyist, $720; assistant messenger; necessary traveling expenses for collection of records, $100; in all, $17,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 86, line 18, after the words "Chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,100," so as to read:

Bureau of Navigation: Chief clerk, $2,100.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee why the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Navigation is put at $2,100, while the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Steam Engineering is put at $2,200, the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Construction and Repair is put at $2,200, and the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Yards and Docks is put at $2,200? The chief clerk of the Bureau of Navigation has 80 employees under him, while they, with one exception, have less than 58. I want to ask the Senator if he can not make that salary correspond with the others.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the duties of a chief clerk are not always measured by the number of employees under him. I desire to say that this is one of the problems that the committee has to meet. There is not a chief clerk that I know of in any department who is not recommended to have $2,500. In the line of economy we have tried, especially in the War and Navy Departments, where some of the duties that usually fall to chief clerks in civil departments are cared for by commissioned officers, to keep them at $2,000; but the amount of the business done in some of the bureaus has caused the committee to increase one or two of the chief clerks by $100 and one or two by $200. I can say, however, to the Senator that the estimates were for $2,500 each for all of them.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I understand that; but the committee did raise the salary of some of the chief clerks to $2,200, as, for instance, in the case of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. WARREN. Those salaries were raised after careful consideration by the subcommittee, after looking the work of the department over very carefully. They may have erred in judgment, but they were very careful in their investigation.

Mr. OVERMAN. The things considered were length of service, the character of the work to be performed, and the skill and scientific knowledge required in the various bureaus.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I move, on page 86, line 18, to amend the amendment by striking out "$2,100" and inserting "$2,200."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice that the salary of the chief clerk, Office of the Quartermaster General, War Department, is increased from $2,000 to $2,500, as found on page 76.

Mr. WARREN. That is a very different matter. This is simply a small bureau. When I say "small," I do not mean to minimize it; but it is certainly small in comparison with a whole department.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; but the House left it at $2,000. The Senate committee increased the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Navigation to $2,100 and the chief clerk of the Quartermaster General's Office to $2,500.

Mr. WARREN. That proves nothing. Proposed legislation now before the House and the Senate makes the chief clerk of the Quartermaster's Department really the chief clerk of a new supply division, taking in the Pay Department, the Quartermaster's Department, and the Subsistence Department of the entire Army, while this is merely the chief clerkship of a not large bureau.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator says it proves nothing. It proves that the House of Representatives regarded them as on an equality, and placed them at $2,000 each, whereas the Senate committee makes a difference of $400 a year in the two.

Mr. WARREN. The House simply took the current law in both cases.

Mr. CULBERSON. The current law is entitled to some consideration, I think, in the appropriations for salaries.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; and the changes that have taken place are also entitled to some consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 86, line 18, it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "$2,100" and inserting "$2,200."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause, in line 22, before the word "copyists," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten," and in line 23, after the words "in all," to strike out "$77,760" and insert "$79,740," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Navigation: Chief clerk, $2,200; clerks—1 at $2,000, 4 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 8 of class 1, 3 at $1,100 each, 14 at $1,000 each; 14 copyists; 10 copyists, at $840 each; 2 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $600; 5 laborers; in all, $79,740.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I might as well suggest at this point that the clerks should be instructed to change all totals to correspond with amendments when we are through with the bill. I ask that such an order be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, one page 87, line 22, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$7,400" and insert "$9,500," so as to make the clause read:

The services of draftsmen and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only in the Bureau of Equipment, and at rates of compensation not exceeding those paid hereunder prior to January 1, 1912, to carry into effect the various appropriations for "Increase of the Navy" and "Equipment of vessels," to be paid from the appropriation "Equipment of vessels": Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1913 shall not exceed $9,500. A statement of the persons employed hereunder, their duties, and the compensation paid to each shall be made to Congress each year in the annual estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 3, before the words "at $1,200 each," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 7, after the words "Notice to Mariners," to strike out "$1,600" and insert "$1,800"; and in line 21, after the words "in all," to strike out "$102,500" and insert "$103,900," so as to make the clause read:

Hydrographic Office: Hydrographic engineer, $3,000; assistant, $2,200; assistant, $2,000; nautical experts—1 at $1,800, 2 at $1,600 each, 1 at $1,400, 4 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each; clerks—1 of class 2, 1 of class 1; custodian of archives, $1,200; copyists—3 at $900 each, 1 at $840, 2 at $720 each; compiler, $1,400; editor of Notice to Mariners, $1,800; computer, $1,400; draftsmen—3 at $1,800 each, 4 at $1,600 each; 2 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each, 5 at $1,000 each, 1 at $900; 3 apprentice draftsmen, at $700 each; chief engraver, $2,000; engravers—2 at $1,800 each, 3 at $1,600 each, 1 at $1,400, 6 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,000 each, 1 at $720; apprentice engraver, $800; apprentice engraver, $700; plate printers—chief, $1,400, 1 at $1,200, 1 at $1,000, 2 at $900 each, 1 at $800; apprentice plate printers—1 at $700, 1 at $600; chief lithographer, $1,800; 2 lithographers, at $1,000 each; apprentice lithographer, $700; electrotyper and chart plate maker, $1,200; assistant messenger; 4 laborers; helpers—2 at $720 each, 2 at $660 each, 1 at $600, 1 at $500, 1 at $480; in all, $103,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 23, after the name "Sault Ste. Marie," to insert "Panama," so as to read:

Contingent expenses of branch offices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Savannah, New Orleans, San Francisco, Portland (Oreg.), Portland (Me.), Chicago, Cleveland, Port Townsend, Buffalo, Duluth, Sault Ste. Marie, Panama, and Galveston.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 3, after the words "Hydrographic Office," to strike out "$19,000" and insert "$8,000," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of copperplates, steel plates, chart paper, packing boxes, chart portfolios; electrotyping copperplates; cleaning copperplates; tools, instruments, power, and materials for drawing, engraving, and printing; materials for and mounting charts; reduction of charts by photography; photolithographing charts for immediate use; transfer of photolithographic and other charts to copper; care and repairs to printing presses, furniture, instruments, and tools; extra drawing and engraving; translating from foreign languages; telegrams on public business; the preparation of Pilot Charts and their supplements and the printing and mailing of the same; purchase of data for charts and sailing directions and other nautical publications; books of reference, and works and periodicals relating to hydrography, marine meteorology, navigation, surveying, oceanography, and terrestrial magnetism, and to other professional and technical subjects connected with the work of the Hydrographic Office, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 6, after the word "equipment," to strike out "$820" and insert "$500," so as to make the clause read:

Additional drafting equipment, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 7, after the word "equipment," to strike out "$3,120" and insert "$2,000," so as to make the clause read:

Additional photographic equipment, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the end of the following clauses, on page 93:

Nautical Almanac Office: For assistants in preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac, namely: One at $2,000, two at $1,600 each, two at $1,400 each, three at $1,200 each, two at $1,000 each; copyist and typewriter, $900; assistant messenger; and one messenger boy, $420; in all, $15,640.

For pay of computers on piecework in preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac and in improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars, $7,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if he expects to have the bill read again for the purpose of taking up matters not involved in Senate committee amendments? There is a matter in the paragraph which has just been read about which I want to get some information.

Mr. WARREN. The bill will not be read again; but when the reading for committee amendments shall have been concluded, the committee will have certain other amendments to offer, and then the bill will be open to general amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator the purpose of this appropriation of $7,000 for piecework in the preparation of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac? I notice that there are a large number of regular skilled assistants in that office, and I am informed from the records of the office that the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac can be prepared by the regular employees of the office without the employment of extra assistance.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator wish to strike that out?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I move to strike it out.

Mr. WARREN. This is not the time to do it; but unless I have further information in regard to it when the proper time comes I shall not oppose the Senator's motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 93, line 12, after the words "Chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,200," and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$26,380" and insert "$26,580," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Steam Engineering: Chief clerk, $2,200; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 1 at $1,300, 3 of class 1, 1 at $1,100, 3 at $1,000 each, 1 at $840; assistant messenger; 2 laborers; 2 laborers, at $600 each; messenger boy, $600; draftsman, $1,400; assistant draftsman, $1,200; stenographers and typewriters—1 at $1,000, 1 at $900; in all, $26,580.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 8, after the words "Chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,200"; in line 9, before the words "of class three," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 11, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "fourteen"; and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$57,800" and insert "$58,600," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Construction and Repair: Chief clerk, $2,200; clerks—2 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 3 at $1,300 each, 3 of class 1, 9 at $1,100 each, 14 at $1,000 each; 5 copyists; 2 assistant messengers; laborer; messenger boys—9 at $600 each, 1 at $400; in all, $58,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 24, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$78,300" and insert "$88,300," so as to make the clause read:

The services of draftsmen and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only in the Bureau of Construction and Repair and at rates of compensation not exceeding those paid hereunder prior to January 1, 1912, to carry into effect the various appropriations for "Increase of the Navy" and "Construction and Repair," to be paid from the appropriation "Construction and Repair": Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1913 shall not exceed $88,300. A statement of the persons employed hereunder, their duties, and the compensation paid to each shall be made to Congress each year in the annual estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill on page 95 to the end of the following clause:

Bureau of Ordnance: Chief clerk, $2,000; ordnance engineer, mechanical draftsman, and computer, $3,000; draftsman, $1,800; assistant draftsman, $1,400; clerks—2 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 1 at $1,300, 3 of class 1, 1 at $1,100, 5 at $1,000 each; 3 copyists; 2 copyists at $840 each; assistant messenger; messenger boys—2 at $600 each, 2 at $400 each; laborer; in all, $32,960.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in view of the action that was taken with reference to the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Navigation to put him on a par with chief clerks of other bureaus, I think the same change ought to be made—there is more reason, in fact, for making it—in the case of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Ordnance. If the motion can be entertained at this time, I move that "$2,200" be substituted for "$2,000."

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator allude to the chief clerk of the Bureau of Construction and Repair?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the chief clerk of the Bureau of Ordnance; in line 3, on page 95.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion would not now be in order; but the Secretary will make a note of it, and when the committee amendments are disposed of it will then be in order for the Senator to move the amendment. No committee amendment has been made there as in the other case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I noticed the difference, but supposed that possibly the amendment could be offered by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think we had better proceed under the first unanimous-consent agreement as to the consideration of committee amendments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 95, line 25, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight"; in the same line, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; and on page 96, line 5, after the words "in all," to strike out "$110,040" and insert "$113,040," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: Civilian assistant, $2,500; two chief bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; clerks—4 of class 4, 8 of class 3, 7 of class 2, 15 of class 1, 10 at $1,100 each, 28 at $1,000 each, 12 at $900 each; two copyists, at $840 each; five assistant messengers; messenger boys—1 at $600, 3 at $400 each; laborer; 2 laborers, at $600 each; in all, $113,040.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, line 12, after the words "Chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,200," and in line 16, after the words "in all," to strike out "$20,140" and insert "$20,340," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Yards and Docks: Chief clerk, $2,200; draftsman and clerk, $1,800; clerks—1 of class 3, 1 of class 2, 2 of class 1, 1 at $1,100, 6 at $1,000 each; assistant messenger; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each; and 2 laborers; in all, $20,340.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, line 21, before the word "thereunder," to insert "and allotments"; in the same line, after the word "appropriations," to insert "and allotments"; and in line 24, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$40,000" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the clause read:

The services of skilled draftsmen and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only in the Bureau of Yards and Docks to carry into effect the various appropriations and allotments thereunder and be paid from such appropriations and allotments: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1913 shall not exceed $50,000. A statement of the persons employed hereunder, their duties, and the compensation paid to each, shall be made to Congress each year in the annual estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, line 23, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$100" and insert "$250," so as to read:

For stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, drawing materials, horses and wagons to be used only for official purposes, street car tickets not exceeding $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Department of the Interior," on page 99, line 9, after the sum "$2,500," to insert "confidential clerk to the Secretary of the Interior, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, $1,800" in line 11, before the words "of class 4," to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fourteen"; in line 12, before the words "of class two," to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "twenty-two," so as to read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, $12,000; First Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Assistant Secretary, $4,500; chief clerk, including $500 as superintendent of buildings, who shall be chief executive officer of the department and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior to sign official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary and the Assistant Secretaries of the department, $4,000; assistant to the Secretary, $2,750; assistant attorney, $2,500; 2 special inspectors, whose employment shall be limited to the inspection of offices and the work in the several offices under the control of the Department of the Interior, at $2,500 each; 6 inspectors, at $2,500 each; chief disbursing clerk, $2,250; clerk in charge of supplies, $2,250; clerk in charge of mails, files, and archives, $2,250; clerk in charge of publications, $2,250; private secretary to the Secretary of the Interior, $2,500; confidential clerk to the Secretary of the Interior, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, $1,800; clerks—4 at $2,000 each, 14 of class 4, 18 of class 3, 22 of class 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, on page 99, line 13, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "three" and insert "two," so as to read:

Twenty-four of class 1, 2 at $1,000 each.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment on page 99, line 13, may be disagreed to, leaving the number "three" instead of "two."

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 99, in line 17, before the word "typewriter," to insert "assistant multigraph operator, $720"; in line 18, before the word "nine," to strike out "switchboard telephone operator" and insert "two telephone switchboard operators"; in line 21, after the word "plumber," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,100"; in the same line, after the word "electrician," to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,200"; in line 25, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "thirty," and insert "forty," so as to read:

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, $12,000; First Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Assistant Secretary, $4,500; chief clerk, including $500 as superintendent of buildings, who shall be chief executive officer of the department and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior to sign official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary and the Assistant Secretaries of the department, $4,000; assistant to the Secretary, $2,750; assistant attorney, $2,500; 2 special inspectors, whose employment shall be limited to the inspection of offices and the work in the several offices under the control of the Department of the Interior, at $2,500 each; 6 inspectors, at $2,500 each; chief disbursing clerk, $2,250; clerk in charge of supplies, $2,250; clerk in charge of mails, files, and archives, $2,250; clerk in charge of publications, $2,250; private secretary to the Secretary of the Interior, $2,500; confidential clerk to the Secretary of the Interior, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, $1,800; clerks—4 at $2,000 each, 14 of class 4, 18 of class 3, 22 of class 2, 24 of class 1, 3 at $1,000 each; returns office clerk, $1,600; female clerk, to be designated by the President, to sign land patents, $1,200; 8 copyists; multigraph operator, $900; assistant multigraph operator, $720; typewriter repairer, $900; 2 telephone switchboard operators; 9 messengers; 7 assistant messengers; 21 laborers; skilled mechanics—1 at $900 and 1 at $720; 2 carpenters, at $900 each; plumber, $1,100; electrician, $1,200; laborer, $600; 6 laborers, at $480 each; packer, $660; 2 conductors of elevator, at $720 each; 8 charwomen; captain of the watch, $1,200; 40 watchmen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is an increase of 10 watchmen. Is that owing to the fact that the House reduced the number?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, Mr. President; and we have only restored it to conform to the current law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the committee have pretty full hearings about these reductions which the House made?

Mr. WARREN. We had very full hearings about them. In this particular instance we summed up the number of watchmen in all the buildings in the Interior Department, and found that if these reductions were made they would be compelled to discharge young and active men, because under the service rules they could not discharge the old soldiers, and it would leave them without their best and most active young men. Furthermore, considering the fact that they work in eight-hour shifts, none of these watchmen could be spared. It seemed to the committee that the department could hardly get along and properly guard the building with fewer watchmen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I notice that in the State, War, and Navy Department Building there are 39 watchmen; in the Interior Department there are 40 watchmen, in each case for one building——

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait; I have not finished—with a scant allotment of ground about it. What grounds do the watchmen of the State, War, and Navy Department take care of, except that little plot of greenery around the State, War, and Navy Department Building?

Mr. WARREN. There is not very much ground around the State, War, and Navy Building, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What grounds are there in the case of the Interior Department for the 40 watchmen to look after?

Mr. WARREN. But there is the State, War, and Navy Building proper, and then there are several other buildings, some of them near by and some at a distance. All of them have to be taken care of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is nothing near by there, is there, except the White House grounds and the Treasury grounds?

Mr. WARREN. I am not referring so much to the grounds as to the buildings. The Senator knows there is the old Winder Building, right across the way; then there is the old Gen. Grant house, across the way; and there are several other buildings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Mills Building, too, I suppose?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. That goes with the Navy Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Senator ever had a computation made to find out how many watchmen we have for the public buildings in the city outside of the Capitol and the Capitol grounds—the total number of watchmen of other public buildings in the city of Washington?

Mr. WARREN. I think the entire Interior Department takes about sixty-odd men, including the Pension Bureau and all the other bureaus of the department. The Senator has already stated the number in the State, War, and Navy Building. I would not be able to say offhand, but I should say——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The number is 99 for those two departments.

Mr. WARREN. It is in about the same proportion as to all the buildings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator remember how many watchmen there are in the Post Office Building?

Mr. WARREN. The watchmen in the Post Office Building number about 25. In the old Post Office Building I think there are 20 watchmen, but that is now part of the Interior Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have asked the question because it has seemed to me for a long time that some reduction ought to be made in these offices, and the House of Representatives seems to have given the matter careful attention and to have had long hearings. But it seems to me that in nearly every case in the bill—it so appears, at any rate, cursorily—the Senate has just restored the current law.

Mr. WARREN. We have restored the current law, or nearly so, but not quite, I think, in every instance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said "in nearly every case." The action of the House and its examination and thorough search into the matter seems to have been treated with a good deal of contempt.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that they made an especially thorough search about that matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood that they had a very careful inquiry and came to the conclusion that these officers could be dispensed with.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say this to the Senator: Formerly there were fewer watchmen employed because they served 12 hours on and 12 hours off; but a law that has been enacted since then has added 50 per cent from time to time to the number required, because it has reduced the time of employment to an 8-hour basis.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be only an addition of 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. WARREN. Furthermore, the buildings have vastly increased in number and the work of the departments has greatly increased. Some years ago the appropriations for the Agriculture Department were four or five hundred thousand dollars; they are now $16,000,000. The appropriations for the War Department used to be twenty-five or twenty-eight million dollars annually; now the expenditures of that department reach $100,000,000. Of course, those departments occupy various new additional buildings. I would not be able to tell the Senator offhand just how many buildings the Interior Department occupies, but a great many.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can understand, if the Senator will pardon me, how there might be an increase in the aggregate number of watchmen, because of new buildings to be guarded; but I do not understand why there should be any increase as to any particular buildings. The thing that struck me was this: If the Senate committee had made a careful examination, it is curious that it should have happened to arrive at the conclusion in nearly every case that the current law ought to be restored. It seems to me that in some cases it would have arrived at the conclusion the House was right, and in some cases that they had made a little bit too much reduction; but the expenditure of the current law might be reduced somewhere between current law and the House provision. It would appear, upon first blush, on the face of the bill, as if the Senate committee had just acted by wholesale and brought positions and salaries up to the standard of current law.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has jumped at conclusions there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say it would appear so upon the face of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The House did exactly that thing. They made a horizontal cut of an almost exact percentage. The Senate committee has considered each locality separately. In some cases they restored exactly what the terms of the law before provided, and in some cases not quite so. But knowing, of course, that the bill will go to conference and that there we will have a combination of the knowledge of both House and Senate, and as we can not go higher than the Senate provision and can not go lower than the House provision, we feel pretty safe in believing that we shall finally determine the matter correctly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator must pardon me if I made an error, because the error is due to the fact that I have thus far run across no item where the Senate committee has not simply restored the current law.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Mississippi, coming from a long residence in the State, War, and Navy Department Building. That building, of course, is a very large one. There are three departments in it, and a great many entrances; I think there are 16 in all. There are the great main entrances on each face; then there are basement entrances and court-yard entrances, all of which are used. The principal function of the watchmen is to guard those entrances. They have to be there to give directions to people who come in and who would otherwise be lost in that vast building; to keep out drunken men and crazy men; and to perform the duties generally of watchmen. They have to be on 8-hour shifts only; so that there have to be three shifts. You can divide by three the total number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; but after nighttime some of these entrances are locked up; are they not?

Mr. ROOT. Yes; they are locked up, and then the watchmen patrol the building as a regular fire patrol during the night.

The administration of the building has been directed especially toward cutting down expenses. In former years it was customary to have a retired officer in charge of that building, but some few years ago we made a change in that respect. I think I have been a member of that commission twice, and I think it was the first time I was on it when we put a bright young engineer officer in charge, who went to work reducing expenses, and they have been reduced. I remember—I think several years ago—there was a reduction of nine in the number of watchmen. I know they talked to me about it then, and they cut the number down as much as they found it practicable to do safely. Since 1906 they have reduced the cost of running the building from $220,000 to $148,000, because they have been at work there themselves trying to cut down the expenses everywhere they could. I think this number of watchmen is as low as is practicable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has made out an excellent case for the State, War, and Navy Building. It is a great pity that example is not followed with regard to all these buildings.

Before I pass from that subject, however, of course you can not calculate the number of entrances and multiply it by three and get the necessary number of watchmen in that way, because at night most of the entrances, I suppose, are locked up. They are in most buildings, just two or three of them being left open. People are not allowed to enter, anyhow, unless they are Members of Congress or Senators, or upon business, after 2 o'clock in the afternoon. So that the full shift only runs eight hours. But it would be right interesting to know how many men we have in toto serving as watchmen of public buildings, even outside of the Capitol and the Capitol Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 100, line 7, to strike out "$266,930" and insert "$279,970" as the total of the appropriations under the heading "Office of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 100, line 13, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty"; and in line 16, after the words "in all," to strike out "$35,780" and insert "$39,380," so as to make the clause read:

For employees, for the proper protection, heating, care, and preservation of the old Post Office Department building, occupied by the Department of the Interior, namely: Engineer and electrician, $1,600; assistant engineer, $1,000; 4 firemen; 3 watchmen, acting as lieutenants, at $840 each; 20 watchmen; conductor of elevator, $720; 14 laborers; 9 laborers, at $480 each; 3 skilled mechanics (painter, carpenter, and plumber), at $900 each; in all, $39,380.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 100, line 18, after the words "one at," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500"; in the same line, before the words "at $2,750 each," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 19, before the words "at $2,500 each," to strike out "four" and insert "three"; and in line 23, after the words "in all," to strike out "$65,850" and insert "$66,600," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Assistant Attorney General: Assistant attorneys—1 at $3,500, 3 at $2,750 each, 3 at $2,500 each, 7 at $2,250 each, 11 at $2,000 each; medical expert, $2,000; 4 clerks of class 3, 1 of whom shall act as stenographer and 1 of whom shall be a stenographer and typewriter; clerk of class 1; in all, $66,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, line 2, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$3" and insert "$4," and in line 7, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$4,500," so as to make the clause read:

For per diem in lieu of subsistence of two special inspectors, Department of the Interior, while traveling on duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $4 per day, and for actual necessary expenses of transportation (including temporary employment of stenographers, typewriters, and other assistance outside of the District of Columbia, and for incidental expenditures necessary to the efficient conduct of examinations), to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, line 20, after the words "chief clerk," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,750"; in line 23, before the word "chiefs," to insert "Chief of Division of Surveys, $2,750"; in the same line, after the word "division," to strike out "two at $2,400 each" and insert "one at $2,400"; on page 102, line 5, after the word "messengers," to insert "messenger boys—10 at $600 each, 6 at $480 each"; and in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$621,520" and insert "$631,000," so as to make the clause read:

General Land Office: Commissioner of the General Land Office, $5,000; assistant commissioner, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,750; chief law clerk, $2,500; 2 law clerks, at $2,200 each; 3 law examiners of surveyors general and district land offices, at $2,000 each; recorder, $2,000; Chief of Division of Surveys, $2,750; chiefs of division—1 at $2,400, 10 at $2,000 each; assistant chief of division, $2,000; law examiners—13 at $2,000 each, 10 at $1,800 each, 18 at $1,600 each; clerks—27 of class 4, 51 of class 3, 74 of class 2, 77 of class 1, 65 at $1,000 each; 65 copyists; 26 copyists, at $720 each; 2 messengers; 10 assistant messengers; messenger boys—10 at $600 each, 6 at $480 each; 6 skilled laborers, who may act as assistant messengers when required, at $660 each; 16 laborers; laborer, $480; packer, $720; depositary acting for the commissioner as receiver of public moneys, $2,000; clerk and librarian, $1,000; in all, $631,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, line 17, after the words "assistant commissioner," to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$3,750"; in line 18, after the words "chief clerk," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,750," so as to make the clause read:

Indian Office: Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $5,000; assistant commissioner, $3,750; second assistant commissioner, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $2,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 22, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-four"; in line 24, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "forty-three" and insert "thirty-five," so as to make the clause read:

Financial clerk, $2,250; chiefs of division—1 at $2,250, 1 at $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; assistant chief of division, $2,000; private secretary, $1,800; clerks—14 of class 4, 24 of class 3, 24 of class 2, 2 at $1,500 each; 35 of class 1.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, through a little error we shall have to modify the amendment. I ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 104, line 1, after the words "in all," to strike out "$231,710" and insert "$221,260," so as to read: "in all, $221,260."

Mr. WARREN. I move to amend the amendment by changing the total to "$232,460."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 104, line 14, before the words "chief clerk," where it occurs the first time, to insert "Second Deputy Commissioner, $3,600"; on page 105, line 3, after the word "each," to insert "and for the following for care of buildings under the chief clerk of the Interior Department, namely"; in line 5, after the sum "$1,400," to insert "engineer, $1,200; two firemen"; in line 10, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty"; and in the same line, before the words "in all," to strike out "$1,469,700" and insert "$1,481,700," so as to make the clause read:

Pension Office: Commissioner of Pensions, $5,000; Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; Second Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,500; assistant chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $3,000; assistant medical referee, $2,250; 2 qualified surgeons, at $2,000 each; 15 medical examiners, at $1,800 each; 8 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; law clerk, $2,250; chief of board of review, $2,250; 57 principal examiners, at $2,000 each; private secretary, to be selected and appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, $2,000; 16 assistant chiefs of division, at $1,800 each; 3 stenographers, at $1,600 each; clerks—95 of class 4, 100 of class 3, 275 of class 2, 295 of class 1, 65, at $1,000 each; 30 copyists; 27 messengers; 12 assistant messengers; 17 skilled laborers, at $660 each; 20 messenger boys, at $400 each; and for the following for care of buildings under the chief clerk of the Interior Department, namely, superintendent of building, $1,400; engineer, $1,200; 2 firemen; 23 laborers; 10 female laborers, at $400 each; 15 charwomen; 1 painter, and 1 cabinetmaker, skilled in their trades, at $900 each; captain of the watch, $840; 3 sergeants of the watch, at $750 each; 20 watchmen; in all, $1,481,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 13, after the sum "$2,700," to insert "assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, $2,400"; in line 19, before the words "third assistant examiners," to strike out "eighty-eight" and insert "ninety-three"; on page 107, line 2, before the words "of class 4," to strike out "nine" and insert "fourteen"; and in line 9, after the words "in all," to strike out "$1,311,010" and insert "$1,331,410," so as to make the clause read:

Patent Office: Commissioner of Patents, $5,000; first assistant commissioner, who shall perform such duties pertaining to the office of commissioner as may be assigned to him by the commissioner, $4,500; assistant commissioner, who shall perform such duties pertaining to the office of commissioner as may be assigned to him by the commissioner, $3,500; chief clerk, who shall be qualified to act as principal examiner, $3,000; 2 law examiners, at $2,750 each; 3 examiners in chief, at $3,500 each; examiner of interferences, $2,700; examiner of trade-marks and designs, $2,700; assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, $2,400; 6 assistant examiners of trade-marks and designs, at $1,500 each; examiner of classification, $3,600; 43 principal examiners, at $2,700 each; 63 first assistant examiners, at $2,400 each; 73 second assistant examiners, at $2,100 each; 93 third assistant examiners, at $1,800 each; 110 fourth assistant examiners, at $1,500 each; financial clerk, who shall give bonds in such amount as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, $2,250; librarian, $2,000; 6 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 3 assistant chiefs of division, at $1,800 each; private secretary, to be selected and appointed by the Commissioner of Patents, $1,800; translator of languages, $1,800; clerks—14 of class 4, 9 of class 3, 17 of class 2, 130 of class 1, 90 at $1,000 each; 3 skilled draftsmen, at $1,200 each; 4 draftsmen, at $1,000 each; messenger and property clerk, $1,000; 90 copyists; 50 copyists, at $720 each; 4 messengers; 25 assistant messengers; 14 laborers, at $600 each; 45 laborers, at $480 each; 40 messenger boys, at $360 each; in all, $1,331,410.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 107, line 21, after the word "patents," to insert "and such other questions arising in connection with applications for patents as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Patents," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating the question of the public use or sale of inventions for two years or more prior to filing applications for patents, and such other questions arising in connection with applications for patents as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Patents; and for expense attending defense of suits instituted against the Commissioner of Patents, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 17, on page 108, items under the Bureau of Education.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee whether the aggregate for the Bureau of Education is the same as current law? I have received a deluge of letters from all over the country begging that Congress might give this very important bureau more consideration than it has received in the past, and be more liberal in the matter of appropriations. I have not looked it up at all; but I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether the amount is the same as has been heretofore appropriated?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will see about that in a moment. But I desire to say that the demands, if I may term them such, or the wants of this bureau were considerably more than double the amount of the appropriation set out here. They seemed to propose new work, among which they proposed to classify all the colleges in the United States as No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, et cetera, and go into all State school matters.

I may say that the subcommittee and the committee itself were so bewildered with the startling amount that was asked for, and the privileges and powers that they indicated they desired to put into effect, that we did not feel like entering into the proposed increase to any great extent in an annual supply bill.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROOT. I have received some letters in regard to the activities of the Bureau of Education which have led me to feel that there ought to be pretty careful consideration of the scope of the work of that bureau before we undertake to increase the appropriation. There is always a tendency on the part of an officer who is enthusiastic in his work, as he ought to be, to enlarge the scope of the work; and there is a good deal of possibility of this bureau simply duplicating work that is being done perfectly well—done better than the bureau could do it, probably—by other agencies in the country.

Of course we can spend many millions of dollars if we are going to have this bureau take charge of all the educational work of the country; and if we leave to themselves enthusiastic officers who are worth their salt, they certainly will keep on enlarging it. I think, however, that before we increase the appropriation we ought to know whether it is a needful enlargement and one for which we ought to spend the money of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator from New York——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I just wanted to ask the Senator from New York the general nature of the complaint against the Bureau of Education, to which he has referred.

Mr. ROOT. The general nature of the complaint was in regard to the activity of, I suppose, the officer who is styled here "specialist in higher education." He has been sending out classifications of institutions—and I presume this is the same matter the Senator from Wyoming referred to—apparently without having made the investigations which would furnish a proper basis for his classification. It was volunteer work, without the justification of real knowledge, and was regarded by the gentlemen who wrote to me upon the subject as a piece of pure impertinence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from New York will allow me, I do not think the criticism can be made too severe of the classification which has been published.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to complete my answer to the Senator from New Hampshire. I did not wish to take the Senator from Georgia off the floor, however.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had said all I wished to say. I will simply add, in connection with what the Senator from New York has said, that I have examined that classification myself, together with men who are well informed on the subject, and it is utterly inexcusable.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the House has increased the appropriation for the Bureau of Education by the sum of $15,000 over current law, or something like 20 per cent. What the bureau asked from our committee was about $114,000 additional; and included in that were certain matters about which I should be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. I do not wish to take the Senator from New Hampshire from the floor—of course, I could not—but when he has concluded I shall be glad if the Senator from Ohio will give the Senate some information on this subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will conclude by a single further observation. I was not well informed as to what this particular official had been doing. If he has been engaged in an exploitation that is not reasonable or wise, of course he ought to be ignored, but the letters that came to me were so numerous that I did not suppose it was a propaganda without a basis in reason.

I simply feel that we ought to be very liberal in taking care of the educational work of the Government, and I am glad to know that the House, reducing appropriations as a rule, has increased this appropriation $15,000. I am content to know that fact. I hope that this appropriation will enable the bureau to carry on all the proper work of the bureau, and I suppose it will.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, just a word. It has seemed to the committee, and I think it will suggest itself to the Senator from New Hampshire, that so large an appropriation and such an advance step along different lines ought to be considered outside of an annual appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, I quite agree with the Senator on that point. If the bureau, or somebody representing the bureau, asked for $114,000 additional, being much above the entire appropriation for the bureau, I can see that that was unreasonable, and it ought to be considered outside of an appropriation bill, if it is given consideration at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that Dr. Claxton, who is at the head of this bureau, is a young man who is very enthusiastic in his work.

Mr. GALLINGER. And very able.

Mr. OVERMAN. And he is a very able man. He is one of the most distinguished educators in this country. He has submitted an estimate here that I think ought not to be put on an appropriation bill, but it ought to be in separate legislation. I think probably if it would come here on another bill we might give him as much as he has asked, and in some lines we may increase the efficiency of his department.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from New York that the work which has been undertaken by this specialist ought not to be undertaken by the Government. I think the investigation he has made is superficial, taking some colleges and putting them down in the second or third class. The Government has no business to go into that sort of a thing, investigating this college and that college and saying that a college in Mississippi is a third-class institution or a college in North Carolina is a second-class institution and one in New York is a first-class institution. What business has the Government to go into the work of classifying the colleges and placing them in a first class, a second class, a third class, and a fourth class? That is what I condemn. I do not think Dr. Claxton is responsible for it, but this specialist, who also is an enthuiast, has gone beyond where it was intended he should go in creating the office which he fills.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was called to the attention of Dr. Claxton and he did not suppress it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think it was called to his attention until probably after it had been done. I am satisfied that Dr. Claxton in future will not have anything like that going on in his department. In fact, I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will introduce an amendment to prohibit that kind of work, and I am heartily in favor of doing it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, there are two entirely distinct fields to which a governmental department of education may address itself. One is the supervision of the education which is provided by the Government. We do under the Government of the United States provide certain education; we make grants to certain institutions; and we ought to have an agency to look after the expenditure of that money and to look after the institutions through which it is expended.

The other field is the general field of education, and in that field it is appropriate, and has been the case from time immemorial, that the Government should exercise visitorial powers; but the visitorial powers in this country rest with the governments of the States and not with the Government of the United States.

I apprehend that the creation of a position of specialists in higher education in this bureau indicates an impression on the part of the gentlemen connected with the bureau that it is their function to exercise general visitorial powers over the educational institutions of the United States, and the attempt of this specialist in higher education to classify these institutions indicates that he understands that that is his function. If so, he misunderstands it, and we should not appropriate money for the purpose of duplicating outside of the true powers of the Government of the United States the visitation by Government of educational institutions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from New York charge that the bureau or this special officer of the bureau have in any way extended their authority to visitorial powers? I understand that they have simply sought information and tabulated it and published it. I do not understand that the bureau or any official of the bureau have undertaken in any way to perform the duties of a board of visitors to any institutions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it dangerous for this specialist to undertake to classify the colleges and schools without any visitations?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not regard it as dangerous. I regard it as a little severe on the local pride of those colleges which happen to be classified as second and third class.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is very hard to make an exact classification, and if it amounts to anything it will be harmful.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it is invidious. I do not think that they ought to undertake to do that. I agree with the Senator entirely in that regard. But I do not think that there is any objection to the extension of this bureau along lines, commensurate with the growth of the country, in the study of educational methods and a tabulation and publication of the results.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 19, page 109, the last paragraph read being the following:

Office of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds: Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,000; chief electrical engineer, $3,000; civil engineer, $2,400; 2 draftsmen, at $1,200 each; clerk, $1,600; stenographer and typewriter, $1,000; compensation to disbursing clerk, $1,000; messenger; person in charge of the heating of the Supreme Court and central portion of the Capitol, $1,000; laborer in charge of water-closets in central portion of the Capitol, $660; 7 laborers for cleaning Rotunda, corridors, Dome, and old library portion of Capitol, at $660 each; 2 laborers in charge of public closets of the House of Representatives and in the terrace, at $720 each; bookkeeper and accountant, $1,800; and 1 stenographer, at $720; in all, $30,480.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to inquire as to this item of compensation to the disbursing clerk, $1,000, in line 11, on page 109.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose it is for the purpose mentioned, "compensation to disbursing clerk."

Mr. BRISTOW. Is that the salary of the disbursing clerk?

Mr. WARREN. I think not. I will look it up in a moment. I think this is added to some salary on account of duties additional of a disbursing clerk.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to know who is going to get the $1,000.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will let it pass for a moment I will give him the information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator to the language which occurs, not only here but elsewhere, in all these appropriation bills, not only the one of this year, but in all of them:

For books for library, current educational periodicals, other current publications, and completing valuable sets of periodicals, including payment in advance for subscriptions to publications.

And then there follows the amount of money appropriated.

The habit is growing up in the city of Washington in a great many of the departments of collecting libraries, including all the current magazines, for the edification or amusement of the employees. These words are "current educational periodicals," which is all right. It is followed by the language "other current publications." I remember that about 8 or probably 10 years ago there used to be a clause like this in the old agricultural appropriation bill. I was then upon that committee in the House, and we concluded that we would look into that. We went down there and found that Harper's Weekly, and Puck, and various other things were being taken as a part of the scientific paraphernalia of the Agricultural Department library. I expect the same thing is going on right here in the Educational Bureau. I think wherever that sort of language occurs it ought to be stricken out.

The Educational Bureau, for example, ought to have educational periodicals, the Agricultural Department ought to have agricultural periodicals, the State, War, and Navy ought to have certain scientific periodicals and certain military and naval periodicals. Anything that would help in the work of the bureau or the department ought to go there.

Not only is this criticism true as regards periodicals, but it is true as regards books. Many of these departments have very nice little miscellaneous libraries for the delectation of those who draw Government salaries. I do not know just how the books are selected. I presume that when somebody wants a book he suggests it to the party in charge of the bureau or department library and he goes out and buys it at public expense. That I do not know about.

It seems to me that there ought to be a stop put to that in all these departments. I do not suppose we can do it right here. I think I will move—on page 108, line 19—to strike out the words "other current publications."

Mr. WARREN. That being in the House text, the Senator will have to wait until we go through with the bill and act on the other amendments of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I say, I think I shall move that amendment when we come to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a moment. Also, when the language "and completing valuable sets of periodicals" is reached, after the word "of" and before "periodicals," I will move to insert the word "educational." Of course every public official ought to have very near to him the information necessary for his particular business—if it is in the Department of Justice, the law books; if it is in the Patent Office, all sorts of patent decisions and a great many machinery journals and a great many journals that give accounts of new inventions and inventions in other countries. Everybody will understand exactly where the shadowy line of division should come. We have a great public library here, and we should not be building up a hundred separate libraries of various sorts.

I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to suggest to the Senator that while I heartily agree with him, we ought not to stop at this one department when other departments are doing the same thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, I say the same thing is done in all, except I think you will find that it is no longer done in the Agricultural Department. At least I know that years ago it was stricken out. It may have gotten back. I have found by long experience here that whatever is stricken out somehow or other gets back into the appropriation bill in the long run. If we strike it out, somehow or other it will be put back in time, and that may have gotten back in relation to the Agricultural Department library, but I do not think so.

Mr. CULBERSON. It has often been suggested from time to time in considering this bill that there seems to be a duplication. There has been just brought to my attention, at page 108, under the head of "Bureau of Education," the item "specialist in charge of land-grant college statistics, $1,800." Then "collector and compiler of statistics, $2,400," and then, in lines 22 and 23, "for collecting statistics for special reports and circulars of information, $4,000." It seems to me that is a good deal to pay annually for statistics to officials. Then there is a general lump sum of $4,000 for collecting statistics. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it.

Mr. WARREN. It is pretty much the work of the Bureau of Education to collect statistics. We have not changed the House language there.

Mr. CULBERSON. Possibly the House may have been in error in putting that in.

Mr. WARREN. I think it is sometimes. The Senator should be reminded that I was chastised only a few moments ago for differing with the House. On some of these items, when we differ from the House, I have changed them, and there are others where I have thought we should differ, but I was willing to take the judgment of the House. In this matter of education we have not changed the current law. The $15,000 that was added was a lump sum. The Senator may be right about it, but Mr. Claxton, when he was before us, laid particular stress upon the importance of those employees. I confess that I know less about those particular employees than about some of the others.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, during my absence——

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator for one moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have just a word to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. Right here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Senator from Idaho declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. It relates to a matter which has just passed the Senate. I will yield with pleasure to the Senator in a moment. During my absence there was an item I had a check on, on page 55, in the contingent expenses of the Treasury Department, where $250 was added for newspaper clippings. That struck me as being rather an unusual appropriation for a department of the Government. I think they should be fined for taking newspaper clippings rather than be given $250 for buying them. I merely call attention to it.

Mr. WARREN. Let me ask what paragraph it is. I feel sure no such sum is appropriated.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is on page 55; it is a Senate committee amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 22.

Mr. HEYBURN. It ought to be stricken out, if we may recur to it. I had marked it for my attention, but it came up when I was out of the Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. We can leave it and go back to it later on. I will say that it is not an unusual thing for a business office or for any other office to wish to find out what the current literature may be upon scientific or other special subjects, and to subscribe for clippings.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is not on a scientific subject.

Mr. WARREN. Well, any subject, for that matter, upon which they wish to get a consensus of opinion. I do not regard it as anything that is at all outside of the regular expenditures.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will depend upon what papers the clippings come from as to whether they might be for their interest or of value. I merely call attention to it in passing. I think the committee should strike out that amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that it is only a matter of $5, and the $250 is for law books.

Mr. HEYBURN. The item is for newspaper clippings. The amount was raised from $750 to $1,000. So I take it that that raise was for clippings.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; not at all:

For newspapers, newspaper clippings, law books, city directories, and other books of reference relating to the business of the department.

Mr. HEYBURN. Those were all in at $750.

Mr. OVERMAN. The department said it was not sufficient, and they also said they would like to have "clippings" put in there. The clippings amount to only $5 or $10.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not so appear on the face of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me the Senator from Idaho ought not to object to that because——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been passed. It was agreed to some little time ago.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because the authority still remains to buy newspapers, and it certainly is better to buy a clipping rather than a newspaper.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may interrupt the Senator, I did not speak of the newspapers because the House had put that in and an amendment to change the text would not be in order at this time. I only speak of the Senate amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope no discrimination will be made between newspapers and newspaper clippings. The latter are cheaper, and certainly we ought not to limit a library to newspapers. We ought to take the clipping rather than the whole newspaper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What do these departments want with newspapers, anyhow? Of course, I understand everybody in a department wants a newspaper, but he is supposed to buy it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not in favor of either, but I could not understand why there should be objection to newspaper clippings——

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I am not——

Mr. CUMMINS. And not take all the paper, and allow the newspaper itself to enter without any objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. The newspaper can be purchased for 1 cent, and the newspaper clipping costs 5 cents.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not true of all newspapers.

Mr. WARREN. The trouble is, you would have to subscribe for the newspaper and then pay a clerk to look out for the particular items sought for, while these newspaper clippings are furnished upon a particular subject that is important to the office.

Mr. GALLINGER. At 5 cents apiece.

Mr. WARREN. At 5 cents apiece.

I laid aside for a few moments the matter which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] spoke about.

The office of Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds is one that belongs to the House and Senate together. It is like the Capitol police force. The House has as much authority as we have and no more, perhaps, except that they originate legislation. The disbursement that the Senator alludes to has been paid for a great many years to Mr. Evans, who is the chief disbursing clerk of the Interior Department. The Capitol comes under the Interior Department. This clerk gets a salary, I think, of $2,200, and this is the additional compensation that he gets by giving a large bond and disbursing not only the funds of the department proper, but for both the new buildings that have been built here for the House and the Senate, and for everything that comes up of that nature, including all funds handled by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building. It is not a new thing at all. It is quite usual to pay to the chief clerk or the disbursing officer in the department something for the care of the buildings—sometimes $250, sometimes $500—and in the same way an addition sometimes for disbursing But this has been done to compensate him rather than to raise his salary for disbursing these moneys.

Mr. BRISTOW. Those buildings are completed.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, well, their supervision forms no considerable part of his duties. He had this compensation before the House and Senate Office Buildings were built.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the appropriation is made for the "Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds."

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; this Capitol happens to be in charge of the Interior Department, and Mr. Evans is the disbursing clerk of the entire Interior Department.

Mr. BRISTOW. He ought to have a proper salary for that, of course.

Mr. WARREN. Added to that has been the outside work. As I have said, this is quite usual. It does not give him an unreasonable salary. It gives $3,250 for an officer who has to expend many million dollars, and who, of course, is under a heavy bond.

Mr. BRISTOW. He ought to have the same salary that other officers of equal responsibility in other departments have. The disbursing clerks of these departments all perform about the same duties. Now, according to this bill, there would be added to that the disbursement of the funds provided for in this paragraph. The disbursing clerk of the department, as I understand, simply pays the employees and officers of the department and takes care of the departmental expenditures. He does not handle the millions of dollars which the department expends in other lines; he is the disbursing officer who pays the employees of the department; and this officer is given a thousand dollars extra here for disbursing $30,480. That is the situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, in addition to that, he is provided with a bookkeeper and an accountant at $1,800 a year.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Well, the Senator from Kansas may rail against the salaries if he wishes, but this bill does not increase them and the accountant and bookkeeper are one.

Mr. BRISTOW. That does not justify paying a clerk $1,000 extra for disbursing $30,480.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, well——

Mr. LODGE. It is not to pay him for disbursing that amount.

Mr. WARREN. It has nothing whatever to do with that.

Mr. LODGE. This $1,000 is not compensation for disbursing the funds of the Interior Department.

Mr. WARREN. It is for disbursing extra funds.

Mr. LODGE. I think we ought to take the Capitol out of the hands of the Interior Department. I think we should take care of it with our own officers.

Mr. WARREN. If some of these observations which are made when we appropriate according to the terms of the law could impress the minds of those who make them so that they would propose legislation on the subject, then we should know what we were doing. We appropriate under the law as we find it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I move to strike out——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator can not do that in order now, because this is the language of the other House.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, then, I will wait until the proper time arrives.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 110, in line 2, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$100" and insert "$250"; in line 7, after the words "and other," to strike out "absolutely necessary expenses" and insert "necessary expenses not hereinbefore provided for"; in line 8, after the word "including," to insert "traveling expenses"; and in line 10, after the sum "$122,000," to insert:

Provided, That such portion of the appropriation for contingent expenses as may be allotted to the Bureau of Mines by the Secretary of the Interior shall be available for the purchase of furniture and such other supplies hereinbefore enumerated as may be required for the use of the Pittsburgh Experiment Station as well as the Washington office of said bureau.

So as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of the Interior: The following sums, which shall be so apportioned as to prevent deficiencies therein, namely: For contingent expenses of the office of the Secretary of the Interior and the bureaus, offices, and buildings of the Interior Department, including $7,500 for the Civil Service Commission: For furniture, carpets, ice, lumber, hardware, dry goods, advertising, telegraphing, street-car tickets not exceeding $250, expressage, wagons and harness, motor trucks, motor cycles, and bicycles, maintenance and exchange of same, food, forage, and shoeing of horses, diagrams, awnings, filing and labor-saving devices, constructing model and other cases and furniture, and other necessary expenses not hereinbefore provided for, including traveling expenses, fuel and lights, typewriting and adding machines and exchange of same, $122,000: Provided, That such portion of the appropriation for contingent expenses as may be allotted to the Bureau of Mines by the Secretary of the Interior shall be available for the purchase of furniture and such other supplies hereinbefore enumerated as may be required for the use of the Pittsburgh Experiment Station as well as the Washington office of said bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 111, line 10, after the date "nineteen hundred and thirteen," to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior may hereafter, in his discretion and in the interest of economy, use the funds provided in the appropriation for stationery and for contingent expenses of the Department of the Interior, for the purchase and distribution of supplies for the use of subordinate offices and Indian schools having appropriations available for the purchase of supplies: Provided, That the said appropriations of the department shall be reimbursed from the appropriations for the offices and schools so supplied by the medium of transfer vouchers which, when properly executed, shall be recognized and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and such vouchers, bearing the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or one of his assistants, shall be accepted by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department as sufficient evidence that the supplies charged for have been or will be paid for from the said department appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 112, line 6, after the word "department," to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$2,000," so as to make the clause read:

For professional and scientific books, law books, and books to complete broken sets, periodicals, directories, and other books of reference relating to the business of the department, $2,000, of which sum $250 may be used for the Civil Service Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 112, line 20, after the word "building," to strike out "northeast corner Eighth and G Streets NW.," and in line 21, after the words "Bureau of Mines," to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

For rent of building for the Bureau of Mines, $10,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire why this increase in the rent of the building for the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. WARREN. The Bureau of Mines, as we were advised by the Department of Commerce and Labor, has not nearly enough room and must either seek a larger building or have an additional building erected alongside of it. We did not give them the amount that was estimated, the subcommittee believing that, instead of $12,500 they could possibly get along with $10,000. They seem to be hampered with their business now for want of room.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me that $7,500 ought to rent a pretty good building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Surveyors general and their clerks," on page 113, line 3, after the word "office," to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$9,000," and in line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$11,000" and insert "$13,000," so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general and ex officio secretary of the District of Alaska, $4,000; clerks in his office, $9,000; in all, $13,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, line 10, after the name "Arizona," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000," and in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$15,500" and insert "$16,000," so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general of Arizona, $3,000; and for the clerks in his office, $13,000; in all, $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 114, line 9, after the word "office," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$16,200," and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$19,200," so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general of Idaho, $3,000; and for the clerks in his office, $16,200; in all, $19,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 114, line 22, after the word "office," to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$9,000," and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$12,000," so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general of Nevada, $3,000; and for the clerks in his office, $9,000; in all, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 115, line 3, after the name "New Mexico," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000," and in line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$18,500," so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general of New Mexico, $3,000; and for clerks in his office, $15,500; in all, $18,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 115, after line 14, to insert:

For surveyor general of South Dakota, $2,000.
For the clerks in his office, $5,000.
For rent of office for the surveyor general, pay of messengers, stationery supplies, drafting instruments, fuel, ice, binding records, post-office box rent, telegrams, registration of letters, towels, furniture and typewriter repairs, books of reference for office use, and other incidental expenses, including the exchange of typewriters, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 115, line 24, after the word "office," to strike out "$12,000" and insert "$16,000," and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$19,000," so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general of Utah, $3,000; and for the clerks in his office, $16,000; in all, $19,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 116, line 14, after the word "office," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$18,000," and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$21,000," so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor general of Wyoming, $3,000, and for the clerks in his office, $18,000; in all, $21,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 116, line 19, after the word "typewriters," to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,200," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of messenger, stationery, and supplies, lights, printing, binding, books, post-office box rent, drafting instruments, mounting maps, ice, towels, furniture and repairs, books of reference for office use, and other incidental expenses, including the exchange of typewriters, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, line 6, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$100" and insert "$200," so as to read:

For miscellaneous items, including the exchange of typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices; street car tickets not exceeding $200.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 13, on page 124.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, some impatience is manifested on the part of Senators who have other matters to present. I will now ask, therefore, to lay aside the bill, with the notice that I wish to take it up on Monday, and, if possible, finish its consideration on that day.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, at a meeting held this afternoon of the full committee appointed to investigate whether in the election of Senator LORIMER there was any fraud used, I was requested by all the members of the committee present to present a request for unanimous consent, which I will send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Secretary will read the request.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Saturday, July 6, 1912, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, declaring that corrupt practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator from Illinois, and that his election was invalid; and that before adjournment on that legislative day a vote be taken upon said resolution and all amendments to and substitutes therefor.

It is further agreed by unanimous consent that in the event a date for final adjournment of Congress be fixed prior to July 6, 1912, this order be vacated and an earlier legislative day for voting upon said resolution and amendments and substitutes be agreed upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6612) for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Tennessee.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Tennessee, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMORIAL TO ARCHIBALD W. BUTT AND F. D. MILLET.

Mr. ROOT. From the Committee on the Library, I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington of a joint memorial to Maj. Archibald W. Butt and Francis Davis Millet, and I submit a report (No. 866) thereon.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, and call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission for the erection on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a joint memorial, of simple and artistic form, to Maj. Archibald W. Butt, United States Army, and Mr. Francis Davis Millet, vice chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, officers of the United States who perished in the Titanic disaster: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the President of the United States upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the joint resolution should go over. When we select two persons out of all those who died in that tragedy and erect a monument or provide that grounds may be given on which to erect a monument for those particular persons, and to no one else, it seems to me as if we are doing more or less of an injustice to all the others. I would favor a proposition that a monument should be erected for all of those who perished in that great disaster; but I believe we ought to pause, and not put through a joint resolution of this kind without further consideration.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, of course if he objects there is no remedy for that; but I desire to correct the impression, in order that it may not go out, that this memorial is intended to be a monument. It is simply a drinking fountain which it is proposed to erect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Whatever it is, it is designed to express a sentiment; and what I object to is that a sentiment of sympathy, admiration, or honor should be given to only two of those who suffered in that great tragedy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator will not take that position. If the joint resolution meant what he seems to think it means, he would be correct in taking the position; but it does not mean that; it does not mean to express this sentiment for these two men exclusively. There is nothing in this measure to prevent any other association of people hereafter who wish to raise a certain amount of money for the purpose of erecting a monument to any other victims of the Titanic disaster from having granted to them a site in precisely the same way.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why not provide, then, that it shall be for all of the victims of that disaster?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Permission will undoubtedly be granted to them whenever they shall request it. I understand, in fact I have seen it stated in the public prints, that there is an association formed, or, at any rate, one was to be formed, for the purpose of collecting money to erect a monument to the victims of the Titanic disaster.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we should give grounds for that purpose, I think we would be doing a laudable act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These two happened to be officers of the United States. Their friends here in Washington, desiring to pay sweet reverence to their memory, are going to raise the money, or have raised it, and ask nothing from the public except a site upon which to erect the monument.

With all these grounds around here, if the children of the Senator from North Dakota, after his death, wanted to erect a monument to him somewhere, I should see no objection to it, so far as that is concerned. But to balk a movement of loyalty and friendship, of intimate friends, loving friends, who desire to erect a memorial to these two officers of the United States, simply because the people of the United States have not raised a fund to erect a monument to all the victims of the Titanic, does not seem to me to be the right thing to do.

I hope the Senator will not object to the joint resolution reported by the Senator from New York.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, answering the Senator, there are those from my own State to-day sleeping beneath the waves who were passengers upon that ill-fated ship. I should feel that I was more or less presumptuous if I should ask for a bill that granted me and my friends, mourners for those who were lost, a right to a piece of public ground in this city for the erection of a monument or a memorial of any kind to those from my own State, naming them, or anyone else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from North Dakota asked it, I should not have the slightest hesitation in the world in agreeing to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to these people being given permission to put up monuments to these particular persons upon that ground if the joint resolution is so worded that others may put up monuments to their friends. What I do object to is having two out of the number singled out as worthy of that consideration and the others as not worthy of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not a question of worthiness of our consideration. It is a question of worthiness of the devotion and sweet and tender affection of their own friends who desire to do this. As for the little land that is granted, it would hardly be enough in which to bury either the Senator or myself.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, permit me to make a little further explanation to the Senator from North Dakota. It is not really a case of granting any land. The idea is to put a drinking fountain in the shrubbery at the edge of the White Lot, something that the Commissioners of the District have been studying for a long time and are very anxious to have, and put a simple tablet upon it which shall commemorate these two officers, who happen to have been much concerned with that immediate locality in the performance of their duties for the United States.

If anyone else had had in his lifetime the associations with the place that Maj. Butt and Mr. Millet had, I should say it was equally appropriate that they should be commemorated there. But no one else had. Maj. Butt spent a large part of his mature years in the White House as aid to the President, and Mr. Millet devoted many years of faithful and unselfish service to the public in the beautification of Washington, serving upon the Art Commission. Their memory is necessarily connected with the very place where it is proposed to put this modest little tablet upon the drinking fountain.

A few of their friends have raised a small sum—only three or four thousand dollars—for this modest little memorial to them. If anyone else had associations with the place, the memorial to them might well go there. But this, for these two men, is like putting in their own homes memorials to any of the people that went down on the Titanic. This was their home. This was where we knew them in their lives, and this is where their friends would be glad to see some little thing to commemorate them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that it seems to me the joint resolution ought to state what is to be erected. It says "a monument."

Mr. ROOT. I think the language is "a memorial." I will ask for the reading of the report. There is a little report with it that I will ask to have read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that there was a young boy, a hero, from my State, simply a mail clerk, who stayed at his post, as the evidence shows, carrying mail bags on his shoulders, when the Titanic went down. He did not try to get in any lifeboat. He did not try to leap off. He stayed at his post of duty. The heroine of that disaster was Mrs. Straus. Now, we are not going to let everybody erect monuments on the public grounds here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not to be a monument.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to the erection of a fountain on public grounds, if that is what is proposed; but I gathered from the reading that it was a monument. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be again read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the joint resolution, and read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission for the erection on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a joint memorial, of simple and artistic form—

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I would suggest right there that the joint resolution read:

A drinking fountain as a memorial.

Let us know what we are doing.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may we have the very brief report read?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to hear the reading of the resolution completed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to complete what I desired to state in the beginning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. This matter comes from the Committee on the Library, and is reported here at almost 6 o'clock in the evening, when there are few in the Senate Chamber. The Senator who makes the report asks for a vote before the report has ever been printed. I really feel that probably there should be an amendment to the joint resolution as it comes in. I wish to draft an amendment. I should not wish to do it this evening. It may be possible that I shall conclude that I ought to offer no amendment whatever to it. But I think it ought to go over, so that we may consider its full intendment and its full effect.

If, after reading the report and after carefully reading over the joint resolution, I come to the conclusion that it should not be amended, I certainly shall not ask to have that done. But I think it ought to go over.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, without putting the Senator to the necessity of making an objection, I will ask that it go over.

Mr. BACON. I request that the report be read. The Senator says it is short.

Mr. ROOT. Yes; I will ask that that be done.

Mr. BACON. I make that request in order that the report may be in the RECORD, together with the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, one minute, before that is done. I want to make one suggestion in reply to that of the Senator from New York.

There was on that ship, from Georgia, a brilliant story writer, Jacques Futrelle, a man whom I knew very well. His friends would not expect to come here to place a monument to him. They will place it in Atlanta. He had a number of friends there. They will place on some public grounds in Atlanta, his home, a memorial to him.

I take it for granted that the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Straus will place a memorial to them. They would not place it here; they would erect it in New York, where their field of activity was located. But these two men lived here, and we are acting not as the representatives so much of the National Government as the representatives and controllers of the property of the District. Their friends are here. There is no other public place in which to put a memorial for them except upon public ground here. Scattered over the country, friends of parties whose lives were sacrificed will erect memorials to them, but they will place them at a point where their loved ones lived and where their activities had taken place. For these two men the District of Columbia was the place, and it is not so much a national action on our part as it is the exercise of our authority in control of the public property of the District of Columbia.

Mr. McCUMBER. There were others also who perished from the District of Columbia, were there not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not familiar with any who did.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there were a number. One was Mr. Clarence Moore, who is not mentioned here. However, I wish the joint resolution would go over so that we can take it up at another time.

Mr. ROOT. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be read and the resolution will go to the calendar.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest that the report be printed and let it go over. There is no haste about it.

Mr. ROOT. It is very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not mean that I shall not support the resolution, but I want to see the report in print.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator from New York submitted it as a part of his remarks and had a right to have it read.

Mr. ROOT. I asked to have it read, but I do not want to have a controversy and a squabble here about a matter which is very near to my heart.

Mr. OVERMAN. If any one particularly desires to have it read, I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will continue.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on the Library, submitted the following report (No. 866) to accompany S. J. Res. 108:

The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the resolution (S. J. Res. 108) entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington of a joint memorial to Maj. Archibald W. Butt and Francis Davis Millet," have had the same under consideration and report it back without amendment.

Soon after the Titanic disaster it was suggested that an enduring memorial be erected on public grounds in the city of Washington to the memory of Maj. Archibald W. Butt and Mr. Francis D. Millet. They are believed to be the only commissioned officers of the United States who went down with the Titanic. In addition, they had been close personal friends for years, living in the same house in Washington, and were companions on their last voyage.

It was thought that a simple memorial, probably in the form of a tablet, connected possibly with a small fountain, would be particularly appropriate, if placed somewhere on the public grounds within a sight of the White House, the scene of much of Maj. Butt's public work, and in the vicinity of the Mall and its surrounding public buildings, in connection with which Mr. Millet rendered such valuable services as vice chairman of the National Commission of Fine Arts.

The suggestion was brought to the attention of the President, who approved it.

It was decided that the memorial should be erected entirely with funds contributed by personal friends of Maj. Butt and Mr. Millet. These friends have accordingly raised a fund now amounting to over $3,000, with which it is proposed to pay all expenses of every nature connected with the designing and erection of the memorial.

Mr. Daniel C. French and Mr. Thomas Hastings, of New York, two of the foremost artists of this country, are designing it.

Under the terms of the resolution both the location and design of the memorial must receive the approval of the President and of the Commission on Fine Arts.

Congress is asked to permit the erection on the public grounds of a memorial, simple and inconspicuous, but beautiful, as a tribute from their friends to the two men, bearing the commissions of the United States Government, who lost their lives on the Titanic. This memorial would be an added object of interest and beauty in the public grounds and will involve no expense of any kind to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will go to the calendar.

SNAKE RIVER BRIDGE, WYOMING.

Mr. WARREN. There is a very short local bill that I would like to have disposed of. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3947) to provide for a bridge across Snake River, in Jackson Hole, Wyo.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read as in Committee of the Whole, and the first amendment of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands has been agreed to. Unless a desire is expressed to have the bill read, the next amendment will be stated.

The remaining amendments were on line 4, after the word "of," to strike out the words "the reclamation fund" and insert "any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, through the engineer officer in charge of road and bridge construction and maintenance in the Yellowstone National Park"; in line 12, after the word "determined," to strike out "by the Reclamation Service"; in line 13, before the word "view," to strike out "the" and insert "a"; in the same line, after "the," to strike out "people of" and insert "public travel through"; in line 14, after "Wyoming," to insert "and Idaho"; and in line 15, at the end of the bill, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the local authorities shall cause the approaches to the proposed bridge to be constructed without expense to the United States: And provided further, That the local authorities shall provide for the maintenance and repair of the proposed bridge after it is constructed.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, through the engineer officer in charge of road and bridge construction and maintenance in the Yellowstone National Park, for the construction of a bridge across Snake River, at a point in township 41 or 42 north, range 116 or 117 west, Wyoming, to be determined with a view of best serving the public travel through Jackson Hole and adjacent territory in Wyoming and Idaho: Provided, That the local authorities shall cause the approaches to the proposed bridge to be constructed without expense to the United States: And provided further, That the local authorities shall provide for the maintenance and repair of the proposed bridge after it is constructed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 10, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 8, 1912.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for all the strong, pure, noble, brave men who, by their heroic sacrifices and daring deeds, have contributed to the civilization of our day; that our Republic is ever ready to accord them a place in history and erect monuments to their memory as a testimonial of its gratitude; that to-day will be unveiled in our Capital a monument to the most daring and successful navigator of the unknown seas, who discovered in spite of every obstacle a new world, which he left to posterity. Grant that it may be not only a testimonial of our gratitude but an incentive to those who shall come after us to deeds of heroism and glory; that they may march on to a still higher civilization, to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

STRIKE OF MINERS IN WESTMORELAND COUNTY (PA.) COAL FIELD.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on the 24th of May I introduced a resolution requesting the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to transmit to the House any information in his possession, obtained through special agents or otherwise, concerning the miners' strike in the bituminous coal field in Westmoreland County, Pa. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor on the 24th of May, 1912. I now move to discharge that committee from the further consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 547.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit forthwith to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interests, any information in his possession obtained, through special agents or otherwise, concerning the miners' strike in the bituminous coal field in Westmoreland County, Pa., in the years 1910 and 1911.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to discharge the Committee on Labor from the further consideration of the resolution just read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When was the resolution referred to the Committee on Labor?

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. On the 24th of May.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the matter been taken up by the Committee on Labor; I do not see any of the committee present.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I spoke to the chairman of the committee some time ago about it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Committee on Labor, Mr. Speaker, has no objection to the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to discharge the Committee on Labor from the further consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

SUPPORT AND MAINTENANCE OF BASTARDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 13041) to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia. I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 13041, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 802).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13041) to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words inserted by said amendment of the Senate insert the following: "upon such preliminary examination"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words inserted by said amendment of the Senate insert the following: "who is quick with child"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 4, and agree to an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted in said amendment insert the following: "after becoming quick with child"; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words stricken out after the word "examination," insert as follows: "If the woman be quick with child, or the child having been born and still under two years of age"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the word "pregnant" in said amendment of the Senate, insert the words "quick with child"; and the Senate agree to the same.

BEN JOHNSON,
J. A. M. ADAIR,
L. C. DYER,
Conferees on the part of the House.

WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
CHARLES CURTIS,
ATLEE POMERENE,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The Senate, in passing H. R. 13041, amended the same by adding, in line 5, page 1, after the word "repeal," the words "or modify," making the first section read:

That every child shall be deemed a bastard who shall be begotten and born out of lawful wedlock, but this shall not be deemed to repeal or modify section 957 of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia.

The Senate amended section 2 by adding, on line 7, after the word "woman," the words "who is pregnant with child"; and on line 9, after the word "Columbia," the word "or"; and on line 3, after the word "time," the words "during pregnancy"; and on line 5 by striking out the words "residing in said District," making the section read as follows:

That any unmarried woman who is pregnant with child may go before the clerk of the juvenile court of the District of Columbia, or if therein she has been delivered of a bastard child, or (if that be her place of legal residence) if she was delivered thereof outside of the said District, at any time during pregnancy or within two years after the birth of the bastard, and accuse any person residing in said District of being the father of the child. Before issuing warrant, the clerk shall examine the mother of such bastard child, under oath, concerning her residence, and her marriage or single condition when the child was begotten; where and when she was delivered of such child; and if she was delivered of the child outside of the District, the reason thereof, and reduce her statement to writing, and sign same as clerk. If, however, the clerk shall fail to reduce the statement to writing, or if it should be lost, such failure or loss shall be no cause for dismissing the warrant. Or such warrant may be applied for by the Board of Charities of the District or any person as next friend of the said bastard under 2 years of age.

The Senate also amended section 3 by striking out, on lines 18 and 19, after the word "examination" in line 18, the words "if the child be yet living and under 2 years old"; and on line 25 by striking out, after the word "for," the word "trial" and adding at the beginning of line 24 the words "preliminary examination"; and on line 1, page 3, following the word "who," the words "upon each preliminary examination"; and on line 6, page 3, after the word "next," the word "or"; and at the beginning of line 7 the words "any succeeding"; and on lines 8, 9, and 10, following the word "court" in line 8, the following: "but in the event that the woman be pregnant at the time of the arrest final trial shall not take place until after the birth of the child," so that the amended part of section 3 would read as follows:

That on such examination a warrant shall be issued by the clerk, directed to the United States marshal, or to the major and superintendent or any member of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, requiring the person accused to be arrested and brought for preliminary examination before the judge of the juvenile court, District of Columbia, who, upon each preliminary examination, may require the accused to enter into a bond, with good surety to the United States of America, in a sum to be fixed by such judge, not to exceed $2,500, for his appearance and trial in the juvenile court, District of Columbia, on the first day of the next or any succeeding term thereof, and to perform the judgment of said court, but in the event that the woman be pregnant at the time of the arrest, final trial shall not take place until after the birth of the child.

The conferees on the part of the House accepted the amendments of the Senate with the following amendments: By striking out the word "pregnant," in lines 7 and 8, section 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "quick," making it read "quick with child," and by striking out, on page 2, line 3, the words "during pregnancy" and inserting the words "after becoming quick with child," making it read "at any time after becoming quick with child," and by adding in section 3, line 18, after the word "examination," the following: "If the woman be quick with child, or the child having been born and still under 2 years of age," and by striking out the word "pregnant," on page 3, line 8, and inserting the words "quick with child," so that sections 1, 2, and 3, as agreed upon in conference, will read as follows:

SECTION 1. That every child shall be deemed a bastard who shall be begotten and born out of lawful wedlock, but this shall not be deemed to repeal or modify section 957 of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That any unmarried woman who is quick with child may go before the clerk of the juvenile court of the District of Columbia, or if therein she has been delivered of a bastard child, or (if that be her place of legal residence) if she was delivered thereof outside of the said District, at any time after becoming quick with child or within two years after birth of the bastard, and accuse any person of being the father of the child. Before issuing a warrant, the clerk shall examine the mother of such bastard child, under oath, concerning her residence and her marriage or single condition when the child was begotten; where and when she was delivered of such child; and if she was delivered of the child outside of the District, the reason thereof, and reduce her statement to writing, and sign same as clerk. If, however, the clerk shall fail to reduce the statement to writing, or if it should be lost, such failure or loss shall be no cause for dismissing the warrant. Or such warrant may be applied for by the Board of Charities of the District, or any person as next friend of the said bastard under 2 years of age.

SEC. 3. That on such examination, if the woman be quick with child or the child having been born and still under 2 years of age, a warrant shall be issued by the clerk, directed to the United States marshal, or to the major and superintendent or any member of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, requiring the person accused to be arrested and brought for preliminary examination before the judge of the juvenile court, District of Columbia, who, upon each preliminary examination, may require the accused to enter into bond, with good surety to the United States of America, in a sum to be fixed by such judge, not to exceed $2,500, for his appearance and trial in the juvenile court, District of Columbia, on the first day of the next or any succeeding term thereof, and to perform the judgment of said court. But in the event that the woman be quick with child at the time of the arrest, final trial shall not take place until after the birth of the child. If the person accused shall fail to give bond required of him, the judge shall forthwith commit him to the Washington Asylum and Jail, there to remain until he enter into the required bond or otherwise be discharged by due process of law. In all prosecutions under this act the accused shall, upon his demand therefor, be entitled to a trial by jury; otherwise the trial shall be by the judge.

There were no changes made in sections 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the House bill.

BEN JOHNSON.

The conference report was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of crews of surfmen employed at the life-saving and lifeboat stations, including the old Chicago station, at the rate of $70 per month each for the No. 1 surfman in each station, and at the rate of $65 per month for each of the other surfmen during the period of actual employment, and $3 per day for each occasion of service at other times; rations or commutation thereof for keepers and surfmen; compensation of volunteers at life-saving and lifeboat stations for actual and deserving service rendered upon any occasion of disaster or in any effort to save persons from drowning, at such rate, not to exceed $10 for each volunteer, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; pay of volunteer crews for drill and exercise; compensation of 12 clerks to district superintendents, 1 to each of the district superintendents except that of the eighth district, at such rate as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, not to exceed $900 each; fuel for stations and houses of refuge; repairs and outfits for same; rebuilding and improvement of same, including use of additional land where necessary; supplies and provisions for houses of refuge and for shipwrecked persons succored at stations; traveling expenses of officers under orders from the Treasury Department; for carrying out the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of the act approved May 4, 1882; for draft animals and their maintenance; for telephone lines and care of same; and contingent expenses, including freight, storage, rent, repairs to apparatus, labor, medals, stationery, newspapers for statistical purposes, advertising, and all other necessary expenses not included under any other head of life-saving stations on the coasts of the United States, $1,960,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 31, in line 2, strike out the words "one million nine hundred and sixty thousand dollars" and insert the words "two million thirty-one thousand six hundred and twenty dollars."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the provision for the current year for the paragraph just read is $35,420. The estimates for the coming year were $2,031,000. The reduction recommended by the committee is $75,420 below the amount for the current year and substantially the same amount less than the estimates for the current year.

There is a necessity for some leeway in the Life-Saving Service. I do not desire to take the time of the committee to do more than to refer to the cut that is made. There is nothing in the hearings, I may say, so far as I can discover, that justified this cut. This Life-Saving Service has never been subject to just criticism, and, so far as I know, to any criticism.

The head of that service has long occupied his present position, and has been efficient. We can not, in my judgment, afford to cut out this place for this service. Gentlemen may reply that it may not be needed. It is one of the branches of the public service where we should not take any risk.

The committee has also withheld from the appropriation an estimate for the establishment of two new stations. I believe there are three or four new stations authorized, some of them many years ago, but they have not been established. What further authorizations may be made before the close of this session of Congress I am not informed. I believe that is all I desire to say at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken when he says there is nothing in the hearings which justifies the reduction in this appropriation. Estimates for the year 1911 were $2,037,040. That amount was appropriated by Congress. At the end of the fiscal year there was a surplus of $111,785.38. Work to the extent of $71,000 proposed to be performed during the fiscal year 1911 was carried over until the fiscal year 1912. For 1912, $2,035,420 were given for the service, and it appearing that during this fiscal year work in the neighborhood of $75,000 would be required to be done, which would not necessarily be done during the next fiscal year, the committee recommended a reduction of $75,000, which would leave a surplus of $36,000 upon the basis of the expenditure upon which the service was being conducted.

As to the elimination of appropriations for new stations, the stations have become a joke in the Committee on Appropriations. Even when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was chairman of that committee, he declined to make the appropriations for the stations authorized for many, many years, and each year requested by the service. There were three stations so requested to be established year after year, one of them authorized as far back as 1874, dragging itself wearily along, and the committee year after year during all of those years when the gentleman from Illinois was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations refused to appropriate for it. Another one was authorized in 1882 and a third one in the year 1886. No committee of the House, in control of appropriations for the Life-Saving Service, has ever even tolerated a suggestion that provisions should be made for the three particular stations.

I hardly think there can be much criticism indulged against the committee this year for not providing money to build stations, all of which have been authorized for more than 26 years, and no one of which has ever met the favorable consideration of the Committee on Appropriations. The fact is that there is no necessity and has been no necessity for the stations at the three points mentioned, and the superintendent stated, in effect, that the estimate was submitted because the stations were authorized by law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The current law for this year carries $20,000 for building stations authorized by law. Will the gentleman tell what that has been or will be expended for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the current year?

Mr. MANN. In the current law there is an item of $20,000 for building stations authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes. One at Green Hill, near Kingston, R. I., and one at Eagle Harbor, on Keweenaw Point, Mich. Those are the only two. But as to those other stations it has been the universal opinion of the committee for more than 26 years that there is no necessity for them. The estimate is made every year and declined with the same regularity. The committee feels that, in view of the facts disclosed, it has given all of the money that could be used and there was no necessity for appropriating money that could not be used in the conduct of the service.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I read from the hearings, at page 277:

PAY OF CREWS OF SURFMEN.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "For pay of crews of surfmen employed at the life-saving and lifeboat stations," etc., and the estimate is $2,031,620. The appropriation for the current year is $2,035,420. What is the unexpended balance in this appropriation for the fiscal year 1911?

Mr. KIMBALL. I can not tell. There will be very little left from the appropriation for the fiscal year 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. The year 1911 is complete?

Mr. KIMBALL. The balances now will not be the same as when the outstanding claims and bills are paid. That will not be for six months; possibly a year, or even longer.

Mr. CANNON. That is, for 1911 there are outstanding bills?

Mr. KIMBALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Put in a statement of the unexpended balance and also whatever outstanding accounts there are of which you are aware.

Mr. KIMBALL. Yes, sir. The outstanding claims and bills at this time will exceed $9,000, and it is thought that some $6,000 or $8,000 more will be required for disability claims and freight bills, etc., which have not been presented for payment. The appropriation will be more nearly exhausted during the current year than it has been for a good many years for the reason that the season of navigation on the Lakes was much longer this year than it has been before. The time has been extended.

Now, there is no complaint that any money that has been heretofore appropriated has been misused. There has to be a reasonable leeway.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. They submitted appropriations substantially the same as 1911 and the same as for the current law, and the committee recommends a reduction of $75,000. I do not believe it is good legislation to withhold the appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will look at page 297 of the hearings he will find in place of general talk by Mr. Kimball, in which he could not tell anything accurately about the balance, an exact statement of the balance, and there it shows that the balance on hand February 29, 1912, was $111,785.38. Then he will find a note in explanation of that balance. One explanation given is that the $71,000 of unusual character of work that could not be done during the fiscal year 1911 was carried over to be performed in the fiscal year 1912. Now, there is nothing in the hearings to indicate that that kind of unusual work which cost $71,000 will be needed for the coming year, 1913, and therefore the committee were very properly justified in making the reduction.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me at that point? The boats were not built for 1911 or 1912, but that appropriation lapsed. It is not a continuing appropriation. If it were a continuing appropriation there would be no necessity for this appropriation, but the money goes back, or rather the money did not go out of the Treasury, but it ceased to be available.

Mr. SHERLEY. But, if the gentleman will permit, that is just the point. In 1911 it is true that the money was not used, but he expects out of the 1912 money to expend $71,000 in doing these extraordinary things. If with the amount of money appropriated he can do $71,000 worth of work of extraordinary kind which will not be needed in 1913, then in the absence of other reasons being given the 1913 appropriation needs to be only $71,000 of what it was the year before.

Mr. CANNON. But 1912 expires on the 30th day of June——

Mr. SHERLEY. And these boats will be built.

Mr. CANNON. But that $71,000 will not be expended for boats at the time——

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; he has arranged——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I do not so read it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the words. Here are the words:

In explanation of this large balance of $111,785.38, it should be stated that more than $71,000 of this amount had been allotted for the construction of boats and the rebuilding of certain old and inadequate stations, but owing to delays beyond the control of this bureau the work could not be done or contracted for during the fiscal year 1911. Such work, therefore, had to go over into the current fiscal year and become chargeable to the appropriation for 1912, in consequence of which, and of the unusual length of the active season on the Lakes heretofore mentioned, the appropriation for this year will more nearly approach exhaustion than in any recent year.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman places that construction upon it. I do not believe it bears that construction, but having called the attention of the committee to the cut of $75,000 in the appropriation the committee can assume the responsibility in the event trouble comes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 8 of the act of June 18, 1878 (20 Stats., 164), entitled "An act to organize the Life-Saving Service," authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to detail officers of the Revenue-Marine Service to act as inspectors and assistant inspectors of life-saving stations in the Life-Saving Service, is repealed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order in order to remark that the members of the Committee on Appropriations will bear me out that I have never been captious about objecting to matters they sometimes find it necessary to put in their bills, but have generally followed them with absolute loyalty. This paragraph, however, which I called to the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee, is new legislation, as is also the succeeding paragraph, as is one on page 32, about which I have talked with him, and I do not think he will resist the point of order upon either of the three paragraphs, because I have acquainted him with the fact that the committees having jurisdiction of these subjects have them under consideration, and in conference with the officials who are responsible for the administration of this service, with the approval of the department, they think they are on the road to a satisfactory adjustment of all these subjects with an economical administration of the service and satisfaction to the public.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in justification of the action of the committee, I desire to say that this particular provision was based on the following facts:

The Life-Saving Service is divided into districts. In each district there is a superintendent of that service. Under the act creating the Life-Saving Service in 1878—if I recall the exact year—provision was made that a revenue-cutter officer should be detailed as inspector in each Life-Saving Service district, so that there is a superintendent in each life-saving district inspecting, and there is a revenue-cutter officer inspecting the district superintendents, and then in the city of Washington there is a chief inspector of the Revenue-Cutter Service who inspects the inspectors who inspect the district life-saving superintendents. The committee thought it was one instance in which there was a superabundance of inspection, and that the district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service should be abolished or the Revenue-Cutter Service officers should be prevented from exercising this supervision in the Life-Saving Service. If the district superintendents were competent, they should be able to discharge all the duties devolved upon them. If they are not competent, they should be abolished. It would mean a considerable saving and would relieve for duty in the Revenue-Cutter Service, where they belong, officers appointed and paid for the work in that service.

Mr. BUTLER. In justification of making a reservation of a point of order on this item, I do it in the way of precaution. Not living along the coast, but having had a good many years of observation of the value of this service, and being very anxious that its efficiency should not in any way be disturbed, but that it might be developed and promoted, I did reserve this point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] that this would not impair the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service, although I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], from the investigation he is making, will agree eventually that it will abolish a great many of what are termed "soft snaps" of revenue-cutter officers.

Mr. ADAMSON. That part of the statement of the gentleman from New York I want to refer to briefly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should add this. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has informed me that since the time the Committee on Appropriations has taken this matter up his committee has commenced the preparation of a bill which he believes will result in readjustment of these services and that will not only tend to their improved efficiency but result in considerable economy.

Mr. BUTLER. Will you allow me to go ahead first?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understood from my conference with the chairman of the committee that the point of order would not be resisted in view of the fact of the people having jurisdiction of it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply stated the reasons that justified the committee in making this recommendation.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not understand that the gentleman resisted the point of order. As I understand, the people having it in hand are arranging it satisfactorily. I wanted to state to the chairman that an economy would be worked. This paragraph would frequently save a little money to the Life-Saving Bureau, but it would not save it to the Government, because these officers detailed are still officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and, as I am prepared to show here, if necessary, it would not reduce the cost or expense to the Government one cent. It is, however, true that under the arrangement we are making to adjust both the bureaus we will effect a saving by increasing the efficiency of both. Therefore I think this ought to go through the proper channels and be left to the committees having jurisdiction of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will give me two or three minutes' time, I will say that it seems to me this is clearly in violation of the rule well established and well known by us all.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, nobody questions the fact that the point of order will lie, although whether the point of order should be made is a question on which gentlemen may differ.

Mr. BUTLER. In view of the statement just made, I shall make this point of order and insist upon it, for the reason that I have already stated, and for the further reason that I have a protest here from the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange in which it is stated:

> In our opinion the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service will be greatly prejudiced by the discontinuance of the inspection of life-saving stations by duly detailed officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service. We view with favor an even closer relationship between these two services to still further promote greater efficiency in the protection of life and property.

Now, I do not wish to stand in the way of the committee. I will say, with candor, it is an honest effort to economize.

I do not wish to favor extravagance, but I do not see how this provision will in any way retrench expenditures. It is my fear that it might in some way decrease the efficiency of this valuable and splendid service that renders so much good and affords so much safety to everybody whose life is put in danger on the sea, and for that reason I insist upon this point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. For the reason stated I make the point, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] makes the point of order. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Hereafter there may be detailed to the office of the Life-Saving Service at Washington, D. C., from among those employed under the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, one person skilled in superintendence of the work of construction, to superintend the construction, repair, and improvement of life-saving stations, and while so detailed the salary and expenses of such person shall be paid from the appropriations for the Life-Saving Service as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph. It is new legislation. The gentleman from New York will, I am sure, agree with me as to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course the gentleman understands the purpose of this. Under the law two captains of the Revenue-Cutter Service are detailed to be the superintendents of life-saving structures. The Treasury Department officials contend that the men who navigate boats are not the men best fitted to superintend building operations. The Treasury Department wishes this work to be done in the office of the Supervising Architect.

I was about to inquire whether the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, in its anxiety that the Life-Saving Service should not be impaired in its efficiency, had made any protests against this provision?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there is some justice in the first remark the gentleman made. As to what he said about the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, I am not concerned in that affair. It is true that the law requires two captains to superintend the construction of life-saving buildings, and that is a waste. This paragraph does not make that correction; but the parties having jurisdiction of it have in view that correction, and for that reason the country does not suffer by my making this point of order. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a pro forma amendment, if one can be made, for the purpose of asking whether the item for the commutation for quarters for the revenue-cutter officers ought not to be inserted if the other provision goes out. We have heretofore carried a provision in the appropriating features of the bill for commutation of quarters and allowance for heat and light for officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed to duty in the Life-Saving Service. If these officers are to continue there, I think that expense ought to be charged to the Life-Saving Service. It would not increase the appropriation any.

Mr. FOSTER. That was in the last year's bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have been informed that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is at work on a bill, and the belief is that it will be so arranged as to be satisfactory to all the services concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON. It can not be done in time, however, to meet the exigency mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. If the Revenue-Cutter Service officers are to do this work, the expense of commutation of quarters and allowances should be charged to the Life-Saving Service instead of the Revenue-Cutter Service, as has always been done in the past.

Mr. ADAMSON. It certainly would do no harm to insert those words, and I concur with the gentleman from Illinois in the suggestion that that should be done.

Mr. MANN. Where the item would come in, I will say to the gentleman, is on page 30, line 18, after the word "department": "Commutation of quarters and allowance for heat and light for officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed for duty in the Life-Saving Service."

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman has that provision, I will offer it as an amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sorry to learn that with the going out on a point of order of these other matters that would have tended immediately toward the reform, it may not come in soon enough to dispense with the need for putting in this provision.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest that borrowing from Peter to pay Paul is not a reform.

Mr. SHERLEY. No——

Mr. ADAMSON. Taking it out of one bureau and putting it into another in the same department is not a reform, but merely a shifting.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the very plain provision that would have done away with the appointments from the Revenue-Cutter Service of officers to do work that should be done by superintendents of the Life-Saving Service would have produced a situation in the Revenue-Cutter Service where we would not need to increase the number of officers and could have put these men to doing the work that they were originally intended to perform.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will put a statement in the RECORD in connection with my remarks which shows that, in part, that is erroneous and that the expense would simply be transferred to the Revenue-Cutter Service and not the other.

On page 105 of the annual report of the Life-Saving Service for 1911 it is shown that the amount expended for commutation of quarters and for heat and light for revenue-cutter officers detailed as inspectors and assistant inspectors in the Life-Saving Service for that year was $10,159.25—less than one-half of 1 per cent of the total expenditures for the maintenance of the service for that year.

Now, if these officers are relieved from that duty there will be a saving of that amount to the Life-Saving Service, but not to the Government, because these officers are by law entitled to these emoluments when on special duty, whether the same be performed in their own service, in the Life-Saving Service, or in any other special detail to which they may be assigned.

What, therefore, would be saved to the appropriation for the Life-Saving Service would be added to the expenditures for the Revenue-Cutter Service, and there would be no real saving to the Government. Besides, when you relieve these revenue-cutter officers from this duty, so essential to the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service, there will be no one to perform the work they are now doing of inspecting the stations, including all articles of equipment, furniture, supplies, and all public property of every description, comparing them carefully with the inventories and noting their condition; of taking measures for supplying any deficiency and of seeing that everything is always ready, in complete working order; of conducting the drills and giving instructions to the keepers and their men; of investigating the circumstances of all disasters attended with loss of life and of all charges of dereliction or misconduct on the part of the keepers and crews, and other matters occurring within their districts.

The district superintendents can not do this work. The general superintendent, in his testimony before the committee, stated—page 271 of the report—that the district superintendent has all he can do to perform his regular duties as fiscal agent for the service, and in addition has to have a clerk. And if the district superintendent has not time to do the work now being done by these revenue-cutter officers, who is to do it when they are detached, or is it to be left undone? Secretary Sherman, in a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in 1888 (p. 54, Report of the Life-Saving Service, 1888) says of these revenue-cutter officers that—

> In fact, they are more directly than any other officers responsible for the morale and efficiency of the corps.

Secretary MacVeagh, under whose jurisdiction the two services come, is on record as saying that to disassociate them would be disastrous and that he has been working to secure a closer relationship between them, and this is in the line of progress and development.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I did not understand the gentleman to convey the idea that he does not expect to put in a bill at this session of Congress in time to have Congress consider it.

Mr. MANN. We do not know how long the session will last. With some knowledge of the Life-Saving Service and of the Revenue-Cutter Service, I should like to suggest that the work performed by the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service does not duplicate the work of the different divisions of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not entirely, but it checks up some of their work.

Mr. MANN. If you dispense with the Revenue-Cutter Service in the Life-Saving Service—and I do not say that it ought not to be dispensed with—you will have to increase the number of officers in the Life-Saving Service. I simply call attention to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The superintendents of the Life-Saving Service do not do their work now, because somebody else is doing it.

Mr. MANN. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to say this: These district superintendents do not do the work they should do. The Treasury Department proposed not to fill certain vacancies that existed in the offices of certain district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service, because there was no necessity for the two classes, but conditions arose that made it imperative that vacancies should be filled. If these Revenue-Cutter Service officers were on their vessels, where they ought to be, and not on shore duty, we would not be providing commutation for them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 18, after the word "Department," insert the following: "Commutation of quarters and allowance for heat and light for officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed for duty in the Life-Saving Service."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

For expenses of the Revenue-Cutter Service: For pay and allowances of captain commandant and officers of that rank, senior captains, captains, lieutenants, engineer in chief and officers of that rank, captains of engineers, lieutenants of engineers, two constructors, cadets, cadet engineers, and pilots employed, and rations for pilots; for pay of warrant and petty officers, ships' writers, buglers, seamen, oilers, firemen, coal heavers, water tenders, stewards, cooks, and boys, and for rations for the same; for allowance for clothing for enlisted men; for fuel for vessels, and outfits for the same; ship chandlery and engineers' stores for the same; actual traveling expenses or mileage, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for officers traveling on duty under orders from the Treasury Department; commutation of quarters; for maintenance of vessels in the protection of the seal fisheries in Bering Sea and the other waters of Alaska, and the enforcement of the provisions of law in Alaska; for maintenance of vessels in enforcing the provisions of the acts relating to the anchorage of vessels in the ports of New York and Chicago, and in the Kennebec River, and the movements and anchorage of vessels in St. Marys River; not exceeding $5,000 for the improvement of the depot for the service at Arundel Cove, Md.; not exceeding $150 for medals for excellence in marksmanship; contingent expenses, including wharfage, towage, dockage, freight, advertising, surveys, labor, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $2,260,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that last year there was in the bill a provision for two contract surgeons and two civilian instructors. Can not the chairman of the committee tell us why that provision was left out this year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that the language was eliminated at the request of the service itself; that they are doing the work with regular employees, and they find no necessity for these civilians. They request that the surgeons be dropped.

Mr. FOSTER. There are two surgeons and two civilian instructors.

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that surgeons in the Revenue-Cutter Service are partly provided for by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and it is very likely that if these are cut out they will supply this additional number of surgeons in that way. On some of the revenue cutters, where they make long trips, especially in Pacific waters, where they go to Alaska, it is necessary to carry a surgeon. The Public-Health Service furnishes surgeons, and there have been at times carried two contract surgeons, in order to avoid taking them from the Public-Health Service. I think there is some increase in the bill for the surgeons in the Public-Health Service, and I take it that that is in part intended to replace these surgeons.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

No additional appointments as cadets or cadet engineers shall be made in the Revenue-Cutter Service unless hereafter authorized by Congress.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman make it?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will reserve it. The department is willing at the proper time to dispense with the school ship and cadet school as soon as we can provide for another method to fill vacancies. It will not probably decrease the expense very much, but at the same time it might be inconvenient to the administration. The paragraph is certainly new legislation, and it is under the jurisdiction of the committee that is now considering it and comes within the range of the remarks that I made about the other paragraph.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman a question which I asked a while ago, whether he intends or thinks his committee will be able or unable to bring in legislation covering these points at this session of Congress?

Mr. MANN. I think only the Supreme Being could tell that.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Georgia can tell us what he thinks about it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know what our committee will do, nor when, nor do I know whether Congress will let us pass it or not. Personally I am ready to act when the time is ripe.

Mr. GARNER. About what time will the gentleman be ready to report the legislation?

Mr. ADAMSON. There has been a bill agreed upon, and it has been introduced in the Senate.

Mr. GARNER. Been agreed upon by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I did not say that it had been agreed upon in committee.

Mr. GARNER. Who has agreed upon it?

Mr. ADAMSON. The parties concerned, the two bureaus in the Treasury Department.

Mr. GARNER. Do the views of the bureaus in the Treasury Department meet with the ideas of the gentleman's committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. It meets with my approval. I do not know about the committee.

Mr. GARNER. In what way will this embarrass the President if it remains in the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know anything about the President; I did not say that it would embarrass the President. I referred to the administration of the bureau; I was not referring to the President.

Mr. GARNER. In what way will it embarrass the administration of the bureau?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know how convenient it will be or inconvenient. I will read the gentleman the paragraph that has been agreed upon. Whether it is the best way or not, or whether we can adopt it, I do not know. The proper committee having jurisdiction should be allowed to consider that.

Hereafter vacancies in the grades of third lieutenant and third lieutenant of engineers in the Revenue-Cutter Service may be filled by the appointment of persons who have successfully completed the course of instruction at the United States Naval Academy: Provided, That no such appointment shall be made after the expiration of one year from the time of graduation of the applicant from the Naval Academy: And provided further, That such applicant shall pass a satisfactory physical examination prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I sincerely hope, as at present advised, that that will not become the law. The training at the school maintained by the Revenue-Cutter Service is so far superior to the training at Annapolis, as far as seamanship is concerned, that the Revenue-Cutter Service has to-day the best navigators and the best seamen on the ocean, and it ought not to be placed at the mercy of young men coming out of Annapolis and going into the Revenue-Cutter Service before they have learned how to manage a vessel.

Mr. ADAMSON. And it would not be any cheaper, either.

Mr. MANN. No; far more expensive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not concede that this is subject to a point of order; it is clearly within the rule providing for the retrenchment of expenses. At the end of the next year there will be no necessity for any additional appointments in the Revenue-Cutter Service until 1921. It costs $3,000 a year to maintain one of these students and about $11,000 to complete their education.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Are not the number of officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service, including the cadets, fixed by law absolutely, so that they can not add any cadets unless they come within the number provided by law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain about it.

Mr. MANN. That is the fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know that the service is always 14 or 15 officers short, because they do not need all that are authorized.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am making the statement upon good authority.

Mr. MANN. I put a provision in the law limiting the number of officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service, and that is still the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The number of officers, I am informed, is limited to the number of ships.

Mr. MANN. That used to be the law. The law originally fixed the number of officers by the number of ships, and that ran up until there were 37 captains, I believe, and 37 lieutenants, or something like that, and when we passed a law providing for retirement in the Revenue-Cutter Service I asked to have inserted in it, and the House did insert it, a provision fixing and limiting the number of officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service, regardless of the number of additional ships that might be provided for. Since then we have provided for a number of new revenue cutters, but have not increased the number of officers any. The number of officers being fixed, and these cadets being included in the number of officers, if the Revenue-Cutter Service does not need any new officers it would appoint cadets, because they are a part of the officers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury is very clear. Mr. Bailey said to the committee:

> My understanding is that when the present class graduates in 1913, if the school should be discontinued until 1920, the service will not be depleted more than 14 officers. That is, there will not be more than 14 vacancies in the service by 1920. I think the service has been running with about 14 vacancies.

The committee found this a very expensive school. It did not know whether it would be wise to recommend that it be discontinued at this time. Recalling the testimony upon other occasions of gentlemen connected with the Revenue-Cutter Service, who asserted that the training at the Naval Academy was of a character entirely different from that required for Revenue-Cutter Service, the committee had some doubt as to whether the graduates of the Naval Academy would have that training and equipment requisite for the Revenue-Cutter Service. Moreover, it is apparent that the only graduates from the Naval Academy who would enter the Revenue-Cutter Service would be those who for one reason or another could not enter the naval service. It is doubtful whether it is advisable to make the Revenue-Cutter Service a port of refuge for the Naval Academy, and the committee simply believed that in view of the situation it was desirable to stop appointing cadets in the service until such time as the conditions would justify additional appointments. Such appointments could then be made by authority of Congress. For the next seven years we will be educating a number of young gentlemen for this service at a cost of $3,600 each a year, without any possibility of utilizing them in the service.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, my recollection is not as fresh as it might be, but it seems to me that all of these officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service under existing law have to come in as cadets.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's proposition carried in the bill should prevail, you could not add any officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service without specific authorization of Congress hereafter, which could not be done in an appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but some system could be worked out. At the completion of the class of 1913 there will be a period of seven years, during which, based on experience, there would not be more than 14 vacancies in the service. That service continues with about 14 vacancies. There is very little justification for turning out 10 or whatever number would be turned out a year for eight years. That would be a very large number of graduates who could not possibly be utilized in the service.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is coming back, in making that suggestion, to my original proposition, that a system is being worked out by those having it in charge.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This would not prevent any reform being worked out by the gentleman, but it would stop the appointments being made while his committee is working out the reforms.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think that the Committee on Appropriations can, better than anybody else, pass upon those questions that are properly within the jurisdiction of other committees. Different committees have charge of different institutions, bureaus, and subjects, and while this Committee on Appropriations wisely and faithfully appropriates for estimates, there are others of us who have charge of these bureaus and the subjects of their administration and who ought to be consulted as to whether we should cut off an institution prematurely in anticipation of getting some other to take its place. There is many a slip beween the cup and the lip. If the gentleman will refer to the hearings before his own committee he will find that the same captain commandant who made the statement about prospective vacancies also protested against striking off at once this only method of supplying these vacancies before another is supplied.

Now, as to the economy feature of it. It is impossible for it to be an economical movement, except on the conditions, the ifs, the ases, and the whereases that the gentleman suggests about meeting future contingencies, but these propositions might alike be subject to a point of order as being new legislation.

Now, this school and ship, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], are more economical than any other thing that has been suggested. There may be very few vacancies in the next year or two, and I hope there may be. We do not know what casualty or accident may occur. It is not economical, it is not wise, to cripple the bureau by cutting off this only means whereby it can fill these vacancies and supply itself with the necessary officers to carry on its business. I did not mean for sure that we could secure these from Annapolis. I said it would be sometimes difficult and doubtful whether we can do it or not, and none of us insist it would ever be any cheaper to secure cadets from Annapolis to take these places. It is new legislation, it is not shown it is in the interest of economy or the reduction of expenditures, it may involve infinitely more expense in addition to dissatisfaction and inconvenience, besides crippling the service, and I insist this paragraph ought to go out on the point of order, and leave the matter of new legislation to the committees having jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. Without assailing the attempt to restrain the usefulness of this model school——

Mr. SHERLEY. We can not hear the gentleman at all.

Mr. BUTLER. I am endeavoring to make myself heard, but gentlemen appreciate the fact that you have to speak with a voice almost in thunder tones to make one's self heard in the midst of the noise and confusion on the floor; indeed, it is almost impossible to be heard. It is one of the most unsatisfactory places to discuss a question or express a view I have ever known. Now, Mr. Chairman, the act of Congress provides that there shall be a certain number of officers in this service. I do not know whether the chairman of this committee has before him a copy of the hearings. If he has and will turn to page 275 he will find this report:

> The CHAIRMAN. Is the Revenue-Cutter Service a fixed service so far as the number of commissioned officers is concerned, or is it increased from time to time?
> Capt. BERTHOLF. It used to be.
> Capt. MCALLISTER. We formerly had an elastic law, so many officers for each vessel. At the time of the passage of the retirement bill there was an amendment inserted limiting the officers to the number in the service at that time.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, this provision of the appropriation bill is a law, because its purpose is to establish and utilize in the future the services and the admission of young men to this school. Now, what is our parliamentary law upon the inclusion of such a provision in a measure of this kind? The latest exposition, Mr. Chairman, which we have had upon the celebrated Holman rule is the one delivered by the learned gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] when presiding over the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union where the Army appropriation bill was being considered, and you will recall in that opinion the Chairman of the committee laid down many propositions which for all time to come will regulate the proceedings of this body upon a subject like this; among them there is this one. I do not quote him exactly. The effort at retrenchment must be a necessary result, not a conjectural result or a problematical result. This is a problematical result. The expenditure may or may not be reduced. Whether the expenditure is to be reduced will depend upon the wishes of future Congresses, and therefore there is no certainty of reduction; it is necessary that the amount of the reductions be stated in the bill——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BUTLER. In one moment. But from the language of the provision itself there is no necessary and certain reduction to be gained.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit, these cadets from the time they are appointed are paid a certain sum of money.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If this provision passes, those cadets can not be appointed; therefore this money can not be paid; therefore there must be a retrenchment in expenditures by a reduction of officers and pay.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will reread the language of the bill which he assisted in reporting he will discover in the reading of this item the following language, "unless hereafter authorized by Congress." Congress may authorize it to be done. If that language had been excluded and the provision had been to this effect, that in the future no cadet could be appointed, I would concede the gentleman's position to be correct, but inasmuch as the condition is added to this provision it brings it within the expression of the gentleman from Virginia who passed upon this rule, that the question of reduction of expenditures is purely problematical.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit. The committee will not be stopped by those words and if necessary will strike them out, and in point of fact even if it has the full meaning the gentleman gives to it it would come within the rule. No provision reported in this bill or in any other bill in any language conceivable could in the slightest degree prevent a subsequent Congress from providing something else, and the effect of a law is not to be determined by what a subsequent Congress may do, because as to that we have no power.

But this fact remains, that under this provision certain officers that can now be appointed and when appointed shall be entitled to certain compensation, can not be appointed if this provision is adopted. Therefore, the provision does result in lessening the number of officers and pay, and comes directly within the Holman rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman would permit right there, I suggest another fact also remains to which we can not shut our eyes. This system is established by law and has to be maintained, and whether he takes his suggestion out of the bill or not, provision has to be made to run it, and it can not be run cheaper than under this present system.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the fact that the system exists under existing law does not prevent a provision being in order on an appropriation bill abolishing offices if thereby an economy is obtained. Now, the Chairman is not to deal in a parliamentary sense with the question of the wisdom of doing the thing, but simply with the question of whether it does show a reduction of officers and of salaries. In point of fact, we could have gone very much further and abolished even more of the service, and, in a parliamentary sense, been in order, and in point of fact it has been so recommended by a very high and distinguished officer of the Government.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion of the gentleman is that it will effect economy by reducing expenses. My reply is he is stared in the face by the fact the place will have to be supplied, and he knows it will have to be supplied, and he has not demonstrated it will not be supplied in any cheaper manner, and therefore he fails to show it will be any saving to the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that while he has been addressing the committee the Chair has not been able to hear all that he has said. The Chair would like to hear as to clause 2, Rule XXI.

Mr. SHERLEY. In substance, the Holman rule provides it shall be in order on an appropriation bill to have provisions that otherwise would be subject to a point of order because changing existing laws if those provisions result in lessening the number of officers and the expense of the Government. Now, this provision makes impossible until a given date the appointment of a number of officers that now could be appointed, and to that extent reduces the number of officers, and, as the record shows, these cadets are paid a given sum from the time they are appointed; it also reduces the expense in connection with the service and is therefore in order under the rule. Now, the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], that if this is done some other method will have to be provided for supplying these officers, is a suggestion based upon his opinion of what the need of the service may be, but the Chair, in considering a parliamentary proposition, is not concerned with the wisdom of the proposal, neither is he concerned with what may be the ultimate need of a particular service, but he is concerned with the one plain proposition of whether the effect of the provision is to reduce either the number of officers or the pay. If it does, it is in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to repeat myself, but the act of Congress provides that there shall be so many officers in this service. I will concede that a positive enactment to the effect that there shall be no further cadets appointed would be a retrenchment of expenditures. Quoting the opinion further of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], easily understood by all of us, that this retrenchment must be a necessary result, and if it did provide positively for the reduction of the number of officers or the number of cadets, I concede that it would come strictly within the Holman rule. But it depends not upon our action here whether or not there shall be a reduction, but upon the action of subsequent Congresses. This Congress may to-morrow enact a law providing for the appointment of cadets at this school. The next Congress may do so. And if such an event should occur, if Congress should so enact, there would be no retrenchment in expenditure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say a word. The rule is—

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

This provision does change existing law. It does away with the right of appointment of cadets in the Revenue-Cutter Service which now exists. It is germane to the bill because the bill carries appropriations for the maintenance of the Revenue-Cutter Service, including the school and the cadets, with their pay. The provision retrenches expenditures, because it reduces the number of officers, as well as the salaries of officers of the United States, because it prohibits appointments which under the law can now be made.

It is not necessary to search for authorities. If this provision be not in order under the language of this rule, it is impossible to draw one that is in order.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] makes a most extraordinary argument, and that is that because the Congress under its constitutional powers at some future time may legislate in a manner that would be inconsistent with some proposed legislation at this time, therefore even legislation which would wipe out an entire service could not be construed as abolishing or reducing the number of officers, because, forsooth, the next session of Congress might enact legislation reestablishing the entire service. His argument, of course, is not to be taken seriously by the Chair, but it is the best argument that could be made for an indefensible case.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is a strict constructionist in some things. But he has admitted that this is new legislation. He seeks to justify it on the ground that it reduces expenses, which he has not shown. He has convinced me, however, that it is subject to a point of order on another ground, namely, that it is not germane to the bill.

If he wanted to draw a provision that would be germane to the bill, he would have had to limit the use of the appropriation by saying, in substance, that "no part of the appropriation shall be used," and so forth. He has gone into the domain of the legislative powers, and says, "No one shall be appointed." If he had said that this should not apply to certain persons, the provision would be germane. But he says "no such appointments shall be made," and I submit that he has failed to demonstrate that this bureau will be run with any reduction of expense if he abolishes the future appointment of cadets.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the whole purpose of the rule was to make in order legislation on an appropriation bill if it did certain things. Now, the gentleman is arguing that any legislative provision on an appropriation bill, to be in order, must be in the form of a limitation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I had simply directed my argument to the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. I had not referred to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Georgia has not differentiated between limitations on appropriation bills and legislation that is in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that they have not brought this under the operation of the Holman rule by demonstrating that this provision will reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now rule. We are dealing with that part of the bill relating to the Revenue-Cutter Service. Lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 32, relate to that service. The Chair therefore holds that it is germane; and, next, that the effect is to retrench expenditures and the number of officers, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Pending that motion, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Georgia will indulge me for a moment while I move that the committee rise in order to permit the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to present a report.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means, reporting back the bill to revise the duties on metals, H. R. 18642, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, with Senate amendments (H. Rept. 857), with the recommendations of the committee, and to return the original papers to the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Alabama, Dr. UNDERWOOD, a question? [Applause.] Is it the intention of the Doctor to call up this bill or the cotton bill first for consideration in the House? Is he able to say?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that it has not been finally determined, but I think it is probable that the amendments to the iron and steel bill will be taken up first.

The SPEAKER. The bill with the Senate amendments will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to report my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, strike out all of lines 23, 24, and 25.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. ADAMSON) there were—ayes 36, noes 46.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, 19 Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs to revenue cutters, $165,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, line 26, strike out "$165,000" and insert "$175,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this estimate is for $175,000. The law for the current year is $175,000. This is for the repair of revenue cutters. I do not recollect how many ships there are in the Revenue-Cutter Service. Does any gentleman know how many?

Mr. ESCH. Forty-three.

Mr. CANNON. Forty-three. This is an important branch of the service. The item which we have just passed appropriates $2,260,000. The estimate for that item was $2,280,000. The appropriation for the current year is $2,288,000, so that there is a cut below the estimate of $20,000 in the item just passed and $28,000 below the current law.

Now, this appropriation for repairs excludes the service from using any of the preceding items for repairs. I hold in my hand the hearing where Capt. Bertholf was before the committee. I believe Capt. Bertholf has come lately to the head of this service.

Mr. ADAMSON. He is the captain commandant.

Mr. CANNON. He says, in answer to a question of the chairman—

We have two appropriations, one the general appropriation, $2,280,000—

Which we have just passed—and the other, $175,000, for repairs. We can not spend every cent of this even if we absolutely need it. We are obliged to leave a margin at the end of the fiscal year, for the law makes it a penal offense if we exceed an appropriation. Two appropriations mean that we must have two margins. We regularly are obliged to turn in an unexpended balance of each appropriation, when we absolutely need the money. If I had one appropriation, I would require only one margin. If you put the $175,000—

That is the appropriation in which I move to give the estimate—into the general appropriation and cut off $10,000, we can get along.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose we cut off $10,000 and try you out first?

Capt. BERTHOLF. All right. Then we will be short, because we would have $10,000 off, in addition to what we must have left over.

The CHAIRMAN. You had two separate items until 1911, and we made an appropriation of $75,000 for repairs?

Capt. BERTHOLF. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, because of the condition of several of the vessels, you got an appropriation of $100,000 for special repairs to vessels?

Capt. BERTHOLF. Yes, sir.

There are other parts of the examination that I do not refer to because it does not bear upon the statement or lessen the force of the statement of the present captain if he be the captain commandant in charge of this service. Here are 43 ships, costing around about $5,000,000, where the annual wear and tear is 5 per cent. Many of them are old and some of them are of wood. If the wear and tear is 5 per cent, which has to be looked after, 5 per cent on $5,000,000 of the ships would be $250,000 alone. If this service ought to exist at all, we ought not to lie awake nights or stay awake in the daytime cutting off $10,000, and thereby crippling the service. That is all I desire to say. It may be that it is possible that this service might be abolished. I do not believe it. I quite agree with the statement of my colleague [Mr. MANN], the former chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that for the size of it this perhaps is the most valuable service we have, practically, day in and day out, upon the seas, and therefore I think it ought not to be embarrassed by little reductions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, some years ago the appropriation carried authority to expend annually $75,000 for the repair of vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and about $75,000 was spent each year. Because of extraordinary repairs asserted to be required on some of the vessels, a specific appropriation of $100,000 additional was carried in the bill. After the appropriation was made on the first occasion, it seemed most peculiar that each year thereafter repairs of an extraordinary character still requiring this additional $100,000 were reported to Congress. It was asserted by those in charge of the Revenue-Cutter Service that if instead of separating the two items for repairs they were consolidated after a year or two very substantial reductions could be made in the amount required, and so Congress for the fiscal year 1911 placed the appropriation for repairs in one item and appropriated $175,000, and for the current fiscal year it appropriated $175,000. Two years having elapsed during which the Revenue-Cutter Service had the benefit of the increase of $100,000 the committee inquired as to the reductions that had been promised if the consolidation were made. The gentleman in charge of the Revenue-Cutter Service then made this statement: That if the repair item were consolidated with the general appropriation for the Revenue-Cutter Service it could be reduced by $10,000, and that the economy could be effected in that way. Having in mind the former attempt of the committee to accomplish the reduction by the consolidation, remembering that it had given the additional $100,000 for two years to enable the service to get its vessels into proper shape, and believing that it was not possible to so engage the attention of these gentlemen upon the necessity of endeavoring to economize in the expenditure of the public moneys, except in one way, the committee reduced the amount for the next fiscal year by $10,000. It was unable to ascertain why the service could do with $165,000 if the appropriation were made in one way and could not do with it if the same amount were made in a different way.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from New York know that the management can not economize in the matter of repairs in ships; that there is a certain amount of deterioration going on every year; and that while you can reduce the appropriation and let the repairs go unmade, you are simply creating a condition from which the ships themselves eventually suffer if the repairs are neglected? While I think the committee, generally speaking, is endeavoring to inaugurate a lot of economies that are justified, yet in this case any attempt to economize by refusing to appropriate for ship repairs is not an economy in point of fact, but an extravagance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I may recall some facts to the gentleman and to the committee which will perhaps induce them to believe that the Committee on Appropriations was justified in its action. I am somewhat familiar with what happens when a proposition is made to repair a ship. Permit anybody with somebody else's money to start to repair a ship, and it is astounding just how far they will go in taking out old parts and putting in new. For a great many years the naval appropriation bill carried a provision that not more than 10 per cent, if I recall correctly, should be expended for repairs upon any wooden vessel of the Navy unless specifically authorized by Congress; and the practice of the Navy Department in the manner of overhauling modern naval vessels grew to such an extent that within the past few years a committee controlled by gentlemen on that side of the House fixed the limitation upon the amount that might be expended for steel vessels of the Navy, the limitation, as I recall, being 20 per cent.

And the experience of those who have had to do with gentlemen in the various services of the department has been that it is necessary to very carefully guard the expenditures made for repairs, or else they will be rebuilding or practically building new ships instead of keeping ships in ordinary repair.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it not a fact that a much larger amount was expended repairing vessels of the same class in the Navy than in the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A much larger expenditure for repairs on naval vessels than on vessels in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the same class? Nobody but the Government of the United States would ever consider expending the same amount for the purpose of keeping vessels in repair.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it not true that the service performed by the revenue-cutter vessels is greater than that of naval vessels of the same class?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The revenue-cutter vessels spend more time at sea. They are used more for the purposes for which they were constructed than vessels in the Navy. If we should deduct the time the naval vessels are laid up for repairs and tied up or out of commission, it would be difficult to find much time that they were being navigated in the sea. Nobody would ever wish to establish as a standard that of the Navy Department as to the repair of vessels. The gentleman from Massachusetts, from his own intimate knowledge and experience in the naval service, is compelled to laugh as he remembers the gross extravagance indulged in in the repair of vessels.

Mr. WEEKS. I will admit that the gentleman from New York is an expert on the question of repairs of naval vessels.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I never denied it; in fact, I have proclaimed it myself, and it did not need the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts to make that fact public.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman made a statement in the course of his remarks to the effect that nobody could tell how much repairs would be made on any ship when the repairs were undertaken unless he placed a limit in advance on the authority of those who had jurisdiction over the ship. I want to say to the gentleman that there is nobody on earth who can tell how much repairs will be required on a ship, revenue cutter, or any other vessel of any kind until you commence to tear the planks off and find out how many rotten timbers there are and what other deterioration has taken place.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have now substituted to a large extent steel vessels for wood. For instance, in the investigation in connection with the Coast and Geodetic Survey, we ascertained that a vessel built in 1899, 13 years of age, costing $175,000, had had expended on it for repairs $96,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not extraordinary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is extraordinary.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is; and I know something about the ship-building business.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman set himself up as an expert ship constructor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I base my opinion on conference with men whose business it is to repair ships, and who have made considerable fortunes out of it. Now, I would take the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois on the question of the amount that should properly be expended in maintaining and keeping up buildings of any kind, or the construction of buildings, or doing any work of that character, but when it comes to marine construction I seek my information from men who are specialists in that line.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that I am in the business of building ships, and running ships, and repairing ships, and owning ships.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, those are fresh-water ships. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I know what it costs to maintain and repair and operate ships, and I say to the gentleman from New York that he is mistaken in his attempted economies. The refusal to repair a ship may do more damage than anybody can estimate. It is not economy to try to save $10,000 from an appropriation for repairs of a boat or ship used in the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee did not do it with any desire to make a show for economy. If it had, we would not be picking up a little item of $10,000, but what we were endeavoring to do was to improve the administration of the service. We have given what we think is enough to keep the vessels in proper repair. There has never been a time that enough money has been appropriated to take care of the unforeseen catastrophes in the service. Whenever they do occur Congress has been ready to meet such emergencies. Having given $200,000 for ship repairs upon the theory that the vessels would be put in condition in which they would be serviceable, a much less sum being required to keep them in repair, it is not unreasonable to cut out only 10 per cent allowed for extraordinary conditions, which sometimes should cease, or else these boats, in the estimation of those who control them, would not be seaworthy at all.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. In case of accident or injury to a revenue cutter is there any vessel in reserve or ready to take its place? I understand not long ago one of the revenue cutters in the Bering Sea had met with an accident. Now, can a vessel be sent to take the place of such a vessel that is disabled, or is there any reserve supply of vessels for such purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall, but the gentleman should have that information more aptly than I, because he is a member of a committee which for years has been investigating the needs of the Revenue-Cutter Service and authorizing vessels as the needs of that service developed. I have not done that especially, and I would be more likely to call on him for such information than to expect him to call upon me.

Mr. ESCH. The only point is the estimates for repairs of $175,000 will not meet such an emergency.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I merely desire to say that this estimate, as made by Capt. Bertholf, the head of this service, who sent it to the Treasury Department, was $250,000. That would be about 5 per cent for the repairs of vessels—some wooden, some 30 years old, some 20 years old, some 10 years old, and very few new vessels when compared with the old ones. It further appears from the statement that 20 years is the practical life of a ship, because then it costs more to keep it in repair than to throw it away as old junk. Now the Treasury Department, no doubt desiring to make in the aggregate low estimates, cut that $250,000 to $175,000. Now, it further appears from Capt. Bertholf's estimates that there is quite a large number of repairs to be made. Why, if they put in a boiler, that means $40,000, according to his statement, and they have to be replaced once in 12 years. Now, I am satisfied, from this hearing, without regard to the question of accident by storm or otherwise—just for ordinary repairs—that $175,000 is not enough, and therefore I made the motion to increase it by $10,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has brought out a fact which is illustrative of the difficulty which confronts a committee dealing with appropriations and desiring in good faith to bring about economies in the Government. He has stated that the original estimates sent to the Treasury Department were considerably in excess of the estimates they submitted. Now, that simply illustrates this proposition. If we take at its face value the estimates made by a man in the service, instead of appropriating what we are appropriating, we would be appropriating two or three times as much, and these demands were evidently so flagrantly extravagant that the Treasury Department itself cut them more than in half. It illustrates how little reliance you can place upon the estimates given. There is a theory that pervades all departments of the Government that Uncle Sam does not need to skimp money, and estimates are sent in by individuals that, if they were in the employ of a private concern, would never see the light of day, and no one knows better than the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. That if it were not for the constant scrutiny of Appropriations Committees we would have our expenditures simply run riot. Now I yield.

Mr. CANNON. The estimate for these repairs was $250,000, made by a practical man in charge; the landsman cuts it to $175,000 and the committee cuts it $10,000 more. I would rather follow the sailor——

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, of course——

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Than the committee, or to follow the Treasury, that is seeking to make as small estimates as possible, and there has been some pretty severe criticism on the Treasury in regard to the cut of estimates.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be; but it is a criticism that is rather unique in America heretofore. We usually have not had to criticize the departments for any undue efforts in the way of economy. Now, it is a very pretty thing and it sounds well to say—I had rather follow the sailor than the landsman. Well, I would in some things, but when the sailor is talking about money that does not concern him directly, when the sailor is not put to the tests that a private concern is of economy or death, and when he goes on the assumption that you have got a Treasury without an end to it, then I think that it is the duty of Congress to come in and cut his estimates. But it is not simply a case of sailors and landsmen. Running all through the departments you will find district officers making a statement that they have to have certain sums of money, and that the service will go to the bow wows if you do not give it, but, in point of fact, when they are cut they manage to get along and the service does not go to the bow wows. When you do undertake to give all they want, you will find in the course of a dozen years that they have piled up, if they can under the terms of the appropriation, great surpluses——

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment—and if they do not they have used it for purposes not within the purview and intention of Congress, and it was necessary to supervise the estimates. I now yield to the sailor. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. What evidence has the gentleman that the $165,000 will be enough for this purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. The statement of these gentlemen that if they had this in the general fund and so, according to their statement, would not need to hoard a balance so as not to be in danger of violating the law as to deficiency, that $165,000 would be sufficient.

Mr. WEEKS. Has any member of the committee ever seen any of these ships in order to make an estimate for himself?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not spent as much time on them as others have.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I believe the time has come when the Committee on Appropriations ought to have available a reasonable sum of money to be used in the employment of outside experts in order that we could get disinterested information upon matters on which we can not be expected to have technical knowledge. But if the gentleman is going to apply the rule that we are to accept the statement of every man as to his estimate unless we have personal technical knowledge of the facts, then we might as well dispense with hearings. We have the right, judging by the past history of the department, judging by the answers of the men, judging by that knowledge that comes to men as to the efficiency of departments and the economy exhibited, to use ordinary common sense in cutting estimates. That we have done here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

For labor and expenses of engraving and printing: For salaries of all necessary employees, other than plate printers and plate printers' assistants, $1,268,051, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denomination than those that may be canceled or retired, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act "To define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of eliciting some information from the chairman of the committee. I should like to ask if this item includes the expenses of preparation of national bank notes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The printing of them.

Mr. TILSON. It does not include the material?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. TILSON. It includes the labor on and the preparation of the plates?

Mr. SHERLEY. The language itself indicates it is for salaries of all necessary employees other than plate printers. The latter are in a separate item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are in the next item.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, at the end of line 14, add the following:

"Provided further, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing national bank currency bearing the name of any national bank or any other distinguishing mark indicating the bank on which such national bank currency is authorized to be issued, and after said date all national bank currency shall be uniform."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order, but I reserve it if the gentleman wishes to make a statement.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on the amendment just a moment. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, but I shall first address myself to the merits of the proposition.

For a long time it has seemed to me there has been a tremendous waste in the matter of the preparation of national-bank notes. The waste comes about in two ways. In the first place, by the enormous number of bank notes that have to be destroyed in case banks consolidate or go into liquidation. In the second place, by the large number of bank notes, including a very large amount of material, that has to be kept on hand to have a separate supply of every denomination of notes for every national bank in the United States. As I remember, there are something like 7,200 national banks. These banks have an average of five denominations of notes. Each denomination must have a separate plate engraved, and of each denomination there must be a supply of notes kept on hand. This makes 36,000 plates that must be engraved and 36,000 different kinds of national-bank notes that must be kept on hand.

And, as I said before, when a national bank goes out of existence or consolidates with another, or changes its name, all these must be destroyed, although it is valuable and costly material. There is an additional expense, and that is in the matter of accounting. With each bank there must be kept a separate account, so that the number of employees necessary to keep the accounts of each separate national bank makes the accounting quite expensive. On the other hand, if we had a uniform currency, which might be issued to every bank—the same kind to each bank—all this detailed accounting with each bank might be done away with and there would remain to the accounting simply the amount issued to each bank and the amount returned, without regard to the particular notes issued or returned.

That is all I care to say at this time as to the merits of the proposition, but if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is going to make a point of order, I would like to speak to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I intend to make a point of order, because it is legislation in violation of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has to say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These plates, Mr. Chairman, are paid for by the national banks and not by the Government.

Mr. TILSON. The printing is not paid for by the banks, and the labor and materials are not paid for by the banks, but that makes no material difference whether the Government or the banks pay for it. Both are entitled to the best possible legislation to prevent economic waste.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it is immaterial who pays it directly. I think the matter has been discussed heretofore, that if a uniform bank note should be adopted, with perhaps some distinguishing mark or some other insignia which would indicate a particular bank issue, it would result in many advantages.

But it would be preposterous on this bill, Mr. Chairman, to make any such rule. This bill provides the money to print the national-bank notes, commencing on the 1st of July. The printing can not be delayed. There is no such surplus that would permit sufficient time to elapse to enable a new design to be adopted, a new scheme to be worked out, the plates to be prepared, and arrangements perfected with the banks for the issuance and redemption of the outstanding notes.

Mr. TILSON. My amendment provides for six months' time, making it effective on the 1st day of January, 1913.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not understand that from the way the amendment was reported.

Mr. TILSON. The amendment says that "after December 31, 1912, no part of this sum shall be so expended," and so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury said it would probably cost a million dollars to reengrave all the plates of the existing national banks.

Mr. TILSON. May I interrupt the gentleman to say that it would take only five or six plates? There would not need to be more than five or six plates engraved, and these would answer for all banks already in existence or hereafter established.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But my recollection is that, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be necessary to have some distinguishing characteristic in order to keep track of redemptions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the amendment read, it provided for no distinguishing mark on the bills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. FOSTER. How are you going to be able to tell what bank that is?

Mr. TILSON. It does not matter in the slightest degree what bank it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Seven thousand banks are issuing national-bank notes. It might be very desirable for some of them to have notes without any distinguishing characteristics.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands that all of these notes are secured by bonds deposited with the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I understand that. But the department also believes, according to my recollection, that it is very essential that there shall be some distinguishing characteristics for the purpose of redemption. At any rate, it would have such a pronounced and widespread effect upon our national currency that it is a matter to be seriously considered. For instance, let me call attention to this fact: We have $620,000,000 of reserve notes that were printed at a very considerable expense. Are they to be entirely destroyed, and before they have been issued?

Mr. MANN. Under existing bank laws is not a national bank required to redeem its own notes when presented at the counter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. And an account must be kept open for an indefinite time while these particular notes are coming in for redemption, and no good purpose is served by it.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman's amendment would not change that law, and under his amendment no one knows the notes issued by a bank that are required to be redeemed on presentation.

Mr. TILSON. That is all useless work, anyway.

Mr. MANN. That may all be; but it is not covered by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] may have some information about the practical workings of it.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to say that if this Congress does its duty, before it expires it will pass such legislation as that there will not be any national-bank notes outstanding, and that will obviate the objections as to the character of the national-bank notes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word on this point of order. This amendment provides that after a certain date notes shall not be printed except of a uniform character. The law provides that notes shall be printed for each national bank. There is no retrenchment of expenditures that has been pointed out. These notes are paid for by the banks. I do not know how the gentleman brings the amendment within the rule so as to make it in order upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Connecticut to address himself, for the benefit of the Chair, to the latter part of his amendment. The first part would be a limitation, but, in the opinion of the Chair, there is affirmative legislation in the latter part of the amendment. The Chair therefore asks the gentleman to address himself to that.

Mr. TILSON. So far as retrenchment is concerned, it seems to be perfectly evident that this would reduce the expenditure, because instead of having to keep a redemption account with every bank in the country, all the accounting that would be necessary would be a simple clearing-house account showing simply so much of the uniform currency taken out and so much returned, regardless of whether it is of one particular bank or another. It is evident that this alone would save a considerable amount of accounting.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose national-bank notes were presented to a subtreasury for redemption. Does the gentleman think the Treasury Department would not necessarily have to keep an account with each bank so as to determine which shall take up the notes? The notes are sent by the Treasury Department to the respective banks.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but they never all come back for redemption.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are sent to the bank to be taken up, because the Treasury has to redeem them, and then they are immediately sent to the bank of issue. What would the Treasury do—just keep paying out the legal tender?

Mr. TILSON. Keep an account with each bank as to the amount of this uniform currency that is issued.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought the gentleman said that such accounts would not be necessary.

Mr. TILSON. Not at all; but accounting only as to amounts. When the bank returns that amount of this currency or any other, the account of that bank will be closed, and it would not be necessary to wait for many years to redeem all the specific notes as they come back. As it is now, the account of each bank has to be kept open for many years. Whenever a bank goes into liquidation the account has to be kept open indefinitely, waiting for the bills of that particular bank to come back; whereas if this uniform currency was in use all that would be necessary for those who wound up the affairs of that bank would be to return the amount of currency—not the particular currency issued by the bank, but that amount of the uniform currency—and take up its securities.

As to the saving, if the gentleman will go to the Treasury Department and find the amount of stock that has to be kept there for each particular denomination of the bills of all these thousands of national banks, and if he will see from day to day the amount of this stock that is rendered obsolete on account of some minor change, and if he will realize that if this uniform currency was used none of this stock would have to be destroyed, he will be convinced that there would be a large saving.

Now, as to the affirmative provision, it is purely a limitation upon the expenditure of the appropriation contained in this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while I do not know but I would be in favor of the reform proposed if it were presented in a complete condition and brought before the House at the proper time, it seems to me that the amendment offered is subject to a point of order. The amendment offered is not a limitation upon the appropriation, but is a positive statement of what the law shall be hereafter. The first part of the amendment is a limitation upon the appropriation; but the latter part of the amendment is a change of law and is not covered by any one of the three provisions of the Holman rule, which, if it applied, would permit an amendment in proper form. Hence this amendment is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For engravers' and printers' materials and other materials except distinctive paper, and for miscellaneous expenses, including purchase, maintenance, and driving of necessary horses and vehicles, and of horse and vehicle for official use of the director when, in writing, ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury, $464,227, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that if the next paragraph should be agreed to, it might be necessary to return to this paragraph and increase the appropriation. I would suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to return to this paragraph.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am going to reserve a point of order on the next paragraph and ask that it go over until some day later.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this fund should be increased, whether the next paragraph remains in the bill or not.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; the gentleman is in charge of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BARTLETT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to bills of the following titles disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. GORE as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

H. R. 18712. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 20628. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 22867. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 23515. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 22194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 23765. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to wives and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6899. An act increasing the limit of cost for the erection and completion of a public building in the city of Richford, State of Vermont.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the proviso of the act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. L., p. 604), directing that all bonds, notes, and checks shall be printed on hand-roller presses shall not apply to checks, the backs and tints of all United States bonds, and the backs and tints of all United States paper money: Provided, That should the Secretary of the Treasury decide to print on power plate-printing presses any of the classes of work herein permitted to be printed on such presses, not more than one-fifth of the total number of hand-roller presses required to produce the estimated quantity of such work in any fiscal year shall be displaced in such fiscal year: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, apply motors to hand-roller presses that are now or may hereafter be operated in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but such presses, if equipped with motors, shall be regarded as hand-roller presses within the meaning of this act.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the ground that this is new legislation, and I ask that the paragraph go over until a later stage in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Until the conclusion of the reading of the bill?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Until some later time, to be agreed upon between myself and the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the matter will not be taken up on Monday, but we may take it up on Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of passing it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are trying to reach some agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey reserves a point of order to this paragraph and asks unanimous consent that it go over until some later time in the consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the fiscal year 1913 all proceeds derived from work performed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, not covered and embraced in the appropriation for said bureau for the said fiscal year, instead of being covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, as provided by the act of August 4, 1886 (24 Stat., p. 227), be credited when received to the appropriation for said bureau for the fiscal year 1913.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that paragraph. I would like to ask how much this has amounted to within the last year or two, what is the amount earned by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing mentioned in this paragraph?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think in the neighborhood of a million dollars.

Mr. MANN. And it mainly came from the Post Office Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Punishment for violations of internal-revenue laws: For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violations, $140,000; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make a detailed statement to Congress once in each year as to how he has expended this sum, and also a detailed statement of all miscellaneous expenditures in the Bureau of Internal Revenue for which appropriation is made in this act.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, page 36, line 1, by striking out the figures "$140,000" and inserting "$150,000."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 36, line 1, amend by striking out the figures "$140,000" and inserting "$150,000."

Mr. CANNON. That is the estimate and the current law, and I know of no reason for cutting this appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In 1910 they had a balance of $35,000 and in 1911 they had a balance of $9,000. The committee saw that they were getting more money than they could possibly spend, and it fixed that sum which they thought was necessary to supply the needs of the service.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think that for a revenue service that yields a very large amount, something like $300,000,000, that $150,000 is a very small sum? I have no desire to appropriate more money than is sufficient for the service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows that about $4,000,000 is expended for this service, and this particular appropriation is for a sort of a special secret service. The bureau in 1910 had $150,000. It was increased from $125,000 in 1909 upon the representations of the bureau. It then had an unexpended balance of $35,000, having expended $10,000 less than it did in 1909. In 1911 it had an unexpended balance of $9,000. In view of the fact that it was receiving more money than it was utilizing—apparently it did not require it—the committee gave the highest amount that the bureau has ever expended in any fiscal year.

Mr. CANNON. Let me read from the hearings, and before I read let me call attention to the fact that it costs $12,000,000 to collect the customs revenue, while to collect this revenue it costs less than $4,000,000.

Now I read from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. What is this fund used for?

Mr. CABELL. Well, that fund is used chiefly in running down moonshine distilleries, moonshine oleomargarine factories, and illicit opium plants. We pay from that fund all guides, possemen, and informers, and then we employ special men for doing that class of work. We make those appointments for short periods. Under the civil-service regulations they can not be appointed to exceed 60 days. During the past year, which is about a normal year, in connection with that fund we had 80 of those special employees, and then we had 1,242 informers, 18 guides, and 3,348 possemen. This is one of the most valuable funds in the Internal-Revenue Service.

Mr. CANNON. Will you need all of it this year?

Mr. CABELL. Yes, sir. The reason why there was an unexpended balance last year—we also pay rewards out of that. Under the internal-revenue laws where information is furnished which leads to the recovery of a tax, a reward, not to exceed 10 per cent, can be paid, and we had several claims for rewards that appeared to be due; the judgments had been entered in favor of the Government, and we cut down some of our raiding in order to have enough money to pay those rewards that appeared to be due. However, appeals were taken in the cases, and they are still being litigated; and that was why we had that unexpended balance last year. If we had known there was to be this delay, we would have gotten after a few more illicit stills.

Mr. PAGE. That is, if you had known that the cases were going to be prolonged?

Mr. CABELL. Yes, sir. It is a rather serious matter to overstep an appropriation, and as the expenditures are always cut very closely we must be somewhat careful not to exceed our allowances. We always have a number of unliquidated claims toward the end of the year in the way of rewards, informers' fees, etc., and we always have to save a safe balance to take care of these.

It seems to me that with $300,000,000 to be collected, and the small amount paid for its collection, we had better not decrease the appropriation. Therefore, I offer the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this money has been expended, very largely, 75 or 80 per cent of it, in the Southern States in suppressing moonshining. A great many of these States have adopted State-wide prohibition laws.

Mr. CANNON. Does prohibition prohibit in those States so far as the moonshiners are concerned?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The expense should not be as great as it hitherto has been. It is very difficult to determine how much should be appropriated for the maintenance of any particular service. One method of ascertaining just what the service may require is to ascertain whether or not any balance has been unexpended from an appropriation, and in that way get some information about the necessities of the service. When it is found that a service has been receiving a certain appropriation and has been expending less than that amount, it is a safe rule to assume that there was no possible way in which it could have been profitably expended, or it would have been. This bill carries the largest sum ever expended for this purpose. I do not believe there is any justification in giving more.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will make the pro forma amendment in order to say that, with the exceedingly high tax upon high wines, alcohol, and the exceedingly large industry, it seems unwise to cut this appropriation. In my own State there is collected, if I recollect right, sixty to eighty millions of dollars. I am not accurate in my statement, and it may be more than that. With this enormous tax it is important that the law should be enforced, not only for the protection of the revenues, but for the protection of the people who pay the tax. I do not believe that because we find there was $1,500 less one year——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but the gentleman must remember that the appropriation to which he refers was $25,000 less than he wishes to give this time, and that is an important fact that seems to have been overlooked.

Mr. CANNON. Let us see about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; let us see about it. The appropriation was $125,000 in 1909, when there was an unexpended balance of $1,500. He proposes to give $150,000 when they have never expended in excess of $140,000.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; they expended last year all but $1,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. They had $9,000 left. The gentleman is again mistaken. They had a balance of $9,000 in 1911 and $35,000 in 1910 out of an appropriation of $150,000, and $1,500 left out of an appropriation of $125,000 in 1909.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the gentleman from New York if the expenses for this purpose do not increase from year to year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not necessarily.

Mr. WEEKS. Are they not greater than they were five years ago?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; they are; but from 1903 to 1908 the appropriation was $100,000. Then this appropriation was increased, if I recall correctly, for the purpose of placing certain denatured alcohol inspectors on the force. It was very quickly ascertained that there was very little excuse for the employment of those inspectors, but after having appointed all of these gentlemen and having got them on the rolls and not being able to utilize them in the denatured alcohol work, a number of them were added to the other work in the field; but in addition to this appropriation for the service, practically the same thing, there is a very large appropriation carried in the legislative bill. I am convinced that the amount recommended here is sufficient for the proper administration of the service.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. If the gentleman insists, and his side of the House stands with him, the estimate will be cut, notwithstanding the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that for the proper performance of his duties the estimate should be given. The gentleman has the power, if his side stands with him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if the logic of the gentleman from Illinois were followed $42,000,000 would be added to this bill, because that is the amount it carries under the estimate submitted by the departments. I recall that when the distinguished gentleman from Illinois happened to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he had less confidence in the judgment of those submitting estimates than any man I have ever known to have served in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I still have, I believe, two minutes remaining, and in those two minutes I want to say again that with a service in which $300,000,000 are collected at an expense of less than $4,000,000, where $150,000 for the prevention of moonshining and the detection of the evasion of excise taxes and of fraud is requested, the gentleman and his committee are not justified in reducing the amount from $150,000 to $140,000. It is a questionable reduction, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Yesterday I made a statement which was challenged by that side of the House, and in connection with it I shall read from the record that which substantiates my statement. I spoke of appropriations made for public buildings for a portion of the fiscal year up to the 4th day of March. I had records to show that in 1910 and 1908 that had been the practice. Now, I shall read from the record of 1900, 12 years ago, when the gentleman from Illinois himself was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. March 30, 1900—this is reading from page 42 of the hearings on the sundry civil bill——

Mr. CANNON. What year; was it in the last century or this?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was in 1900, when the gentleman from Illinois was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and when he asked the Treasury Department to submit to him a statement showing the amount of money that would be desired for authorized public buildings until the 4th of March following.

Mr. CANNON. What has that to do with the prevention of moonshining?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has this to do with the question of moonshining—gentlemen were moonshining here yesterday. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I made a statement as to what had been the practice and custom of the House. I did not make that carelessly; I did not make that without justification and foundation for such a statement; and I was ridiculed and treated with contempt for the assertions, which were treated by gentlemen here as ridiculous. I showed in 1908 and 1910 what the policy of the committee had been in those years. Now, to convince the gentlemen still further that I was correct, I have gone back to 1900, 12 years ago, to show that the gentleman from Illinois himself, as chairman of this committee, acted toward the head of this department in the identical manner that the committee this year has acted. As a matter of fact, let me say to the gentleman from Illinois, much that has been done by the committee at this time has been the result of information that it has acquired from watching the gentleman from Illinois in the discharge of his duties as chairman of that committee.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman refer to public buildings or river and harbor work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Public buildings.

Mr. CANNON. And river and harbor. Why, the gentleman ought to know there was no criticism from me touching the matter of appropriations to the 4th of March. For years that has been the practice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON. I spoke of the gentleman from Illinois, and I assume that when anyone mentioned the gentleman from Illinois nobody would have the presumption to apply that title but to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is just about as accurate as he usually is. He referred to the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the Committee on Appropriations, and when called to account shiftily endeavors to turn the term to the other gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we will call it to the gentleman so that he will see the light.

PUBLIC BUILDING ESTIMATES WITHDRAWN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 30, 1900.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives, United States.
(Through Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants.)

SIR: Referring to the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, which I had the honor to transmit to Congress, it now appears that the following items included therein are not necessary to be provided during this session of Congress—

Then follows the list of items.

While it is the intention of the department to push the work on the above-mentioned buildings with all possible dispatch, yet in each case there being ample funds appropriated for all needs up to the 4th of March, 1901, prior to that date the next session of Congress will be requested to make provision for continuing the work.

This is a letter from Secretary Gage. Now, having demonstrated beyond any question that my position was accurate as to that, let me turn to the question of this appropriation. It is not an easy matter, as I have already stated, to determine how much should be appropriated for any given service, but after a head of a bureau has for several years persuaded Congress to appropriate a specific sum for the conduct of a specific service and Congress upon an investigation ascertains that he has never been able to expend the amount appropriated due to his solicitation, I maintain that Congress is clearly justified, having decided that it is not possible in the proper performance to expend such a sum, in refusing to continue the appropriation. Now, the committee recommended the largest sum expended in any year for this particular service, and upon the statement of the commissioner it is very doubtful whether a larger sum can be expended.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not to oblige any public official nor to be terrorized by the fears that any service will not be adequately performed will the committee appropriate that which, in its judgment, is not required.

Mr. GARNER. This is not one of the lump appropriations, then, which, as appears from statements made at the other end of the Capitol, have been utilized for the purpose of increasing the salaries of its employees where Congress has refused to grant that increase. When we get to one of those appropriations I want to ask the gentleman something about the conduct of the department in reference to these lump appropriations. I understand, however, it has not been the custom of the Treasury Department to make use of the lump appropriations for the purpose of increasing salaries of employees where Congress has refused to grant that increase itself, but it has been the custom of some other departments of the Government to ask for an increase of salary of employees, and failing to get that increase at the hands of Congress they get the lump appropriation, and out of that transfer the employees to a higher salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has not happened in this service.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operating force for public buildings: For the pay of such personal services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary in connection with the care, maintenance, and repair of all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department (except as hereinafter provided), together with the grounds thereof and the equipment and furnishings therein, and of sites for public buildings, including assistant custodians, janitors, watchmen, laborers, and charwomen; engineers, firemen, elevator conductors, coal passers, electricians, dynamo tenders, lampists, and wiremen; and for the mechanical labor force in connection with said buildings, including carpenters, plumbers, steam fitters, machinists, and painters, but in no case shall the rates of compensation for such mechanical labor force be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed, $2,450,000: Provided, That the foregoing appropriation shall be available for use in connection with all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including the customhouse at Washington, D. C., but not including any other public building within the District of Columbia, and exclusive of marine hospitals, quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices: And provided further, That hereafter, unless otherwise specifically provided by law, whenever the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to secure temporary quarters for the use of the Government officials pending the alteration, improvement, or repairs to, or the remodeling, reconstruction, or enlargement of, any public building belonging to the United States under the control of the Treasury Department, including the customhouse, Washington, D. C., but exclusive of any other buildings in the District of Columbia, the appropriation for "Operating force for public buildings" shall be available, if necessary, in connection with certain portions of the premises as may be rented for, or occupied by, such officials, in the same manner, for the same purpose, and to the same extent as if the title to such premises were vested in the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 39, line 13, after the word "employed," by inserting: "But no janitor, watchman, or laborer shall be employed at a rate lower than $60 per month for any period of one month or more."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire the gentleman to reserve a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Very well. Mr. Chairman, if the paragraph itself were not subject to a point of order, I think probably the amendment would be. But the paragraph provides:

But in no case shall the rates of compensation for such mechanical labor force be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed.

I simply add to that provision:

But no janitor, watchman, or laborer shall be employed at a rate lower than $60 per month.

It is quite germane to the provision in the bill, and if my amendment is subject to a point of order, then the provision in the bill was subject to a point of order; and if that be not the case, then my amendment is not now subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not agree with the gentleman. The provision in the bill is a limitation on the amount that might be paid. The proposition of the gentleman is a legislative provision. The provision in the bill is a limitation upon the amount which may be paid. The gentleman takes away any discretion and fixes a minimum rate of pay.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will not seriously make any such contention on the point of order, because he would not want his contention sustained. The provision in the bill is a limitation upon the discretion of the department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is upon the rate of compensation.

Mr. MANN. That is a limitation on the discretion of the department in making employment. It does not purport to be anything else. Here is a provision that the department may employ services at such a salary or on such a basis as it pleases in conformity with existing law. The gentleman interjects in the bill a provision that the rates of compensation shall not be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed. It is not limited merely to this bill. I have added to that a provision only that the rates of compensation shall not be less than $60 per month. I do not believe the gentleman seriously is opposed to the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I think I am. In fact, I know I am.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought not to be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me illustrate. In a community of 1,500 or 2,000 or 3,000 persons we would pay a man occupying the position of janitor at the rate of $60 per month. It is out of all proportion.

Mr. GARNER. And you can get the best janitor in that community for $30 a month.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, this provision as framed is designed, I think, to establish the most equitable method of compensating for service in these public buildings. It is one of the most difficult things to fix a rule for compensation for services in the Federal service. But for work of that character, if we adopt a rule that we shall pay for such service and work in the Government the prevailing rate in the particular community where the person is employed, we come more nearly doing what is equitable than in any other way.

Mr. MANN. To be frank with the gentleman, I have no objection to that provision of the bill and its being carried out, but the trouble is they do not pay prevailing rates. The gentleman provides they shall not pay in excess of the prevailing rate. Or does not the gentleman wish that to be incorporated in the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think so.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any occasion in the large cities for endeavoring to employ janitors under the Treasury on the basis of $50 a month, when the same men, if they can get transferred in the same building to the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department, under the Post Office appropriation bill receive $60 a month.

Mr. GARNER. There ought to be a provision put on the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. This is not fair. We increased the amount in the last Post Office bill so as to provide surely that they would get the $60 a month. I do not insist that this should apply to every place, because it may not be necessary to apply it to every place; but I do not wish to receive letters from the custodian of the public building in Chicago transmitting and recommending applications from men doing janitor work at $50 a month who seek to get into the post office service in order to do the same work, or in some instances less work, at a higher rate of pay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I agree with the gentleman that in some of the large cities, perhaps a large number of cities, the pay of janitors in the Treasury Department is not sufficient.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he let this item go over and see if he can not work out a plan in regard to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can not agree to this amendment, because it will make the compensation of these people in public buildings at many places in the United States so attractive that in many of the smaller communities many men would prefer to be the janitor in the public building there on account of the compensation paid than the postmaster.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Illinois does not contemplate that the bill that has passed the Senate making appropriation for a public building in a certain city in a western district will become a law?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it certainly is not my intention to criticize the Senate. But there are some bills that always pass the House without controversy, and sometimes with no expectation of their becoming laws. Any gentleman here who desires can, I think, without any difficulty at all go to some distinguished gentleman representing his State in another official capacity and ask to have a public-building bill passed for a mud-roads crossing, and if it is presented to that distinguished body it is passed on the expectation that this House will, as it always has done, stop it.

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman will permit, seriously, his amendment would make it impossible to employ a janitor in these smaller towns for the smaller public buildings at a compensation of less than $60 a month. Does the gentleman think that would meet the necessity of the various cases as they exist, if his amendment were adopted?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they employ janitors for much less than that in the public buildings throughout the country or not.

Mr. PAGE. I do know, Mr. Chairman, that in quite a number of places in my own State and in other Southern States, and I presume it is so in other sections of the Union where there are public buildings, a janitor can be employed and is employed in other buildings, not public buildings, as the gentleman from Texas said, at $30 a month, and in some instances at even less than that. For the Government to fix a standard of wages in those communities of double the prevailing standard would not, in my judgment, be a just thing to do.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is anyone on the rolls doing janitor service for the Government at $30 a month anywhere.

Mr. PAGE. I do not think so, but they might be so employed if they were put on at the prevailing rate of wages.

Mr. MANN. It might be that in some places the janitor service is performed on that basis. I do not know; but if so, the person doing the work is not on the rolls as a janitor.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. The Chair will hold to the precedent that in an appropriation bill a paragraph embodying legislation may be perfected by a germane amendment, but this does not permit an amendment which adds additional legislation. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is additional legislation, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 39, line 13, by striking out the figures "450" and inserting the figures "570," so that the amount will be $2,570,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 39, line 13, by striking out the figures "450" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "570," so that the amount will be $2,570,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is one of two or three amendments that I propose to offer. On page 40 I propose to offer an amendment increasing the item for furniture and repairs of same, carpets, gas and electric light fixtures, and so forth, from $800,000 to $900,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Illinois that that has not been read yet.

Mr. CANNON. I understand; but there are two or three amendments here that are on all fours.

There are over a hundred buildings to come in next year, and I think there are a goodly number coming in this year. They must be furnished for service. That includes boxes and post-office furniture for post offices, and proper court-room furniture where there are courts. Yet, instead of increasing the amount, gentlemen recommend a decrease. Oh, I was amused to see our friends, especially on the majority side, agonize for hours yesterday for home consumption because they could not get money that could not be expended for the construction of their buildings before the 4th of March. They just tore passion to tatters. Now, there are a great many buildings in that section of the country, which are to come in this year, that had just as well not be built unless you furnish them for courts and post offices. And I suppose now, with less than a quorum—I should think about 20 Members on that side and 20 on this side—business is to halt while gentlemen interested in buildings that are to be utilized the coming year are getting ready to cuss the Secretary of the Treasury. Their place is here. These appropriations ought to be made according to the estimates. The estimates are not too high for the new buildings that are coming in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make only one observation. The present pay roll of the department is $2,117,128. At the end of the present fiscal year there will be a surplus in this appropriation of $175,000, so that, liberal as Congress has been heretofore, the department has been unable, by a very substantial amount, to utilize it all.

The committee took the figures and went carefully into them and gave the amount it thought would be required for the next fiscal year. The estimate of which the gentleman is speaking includes not only provisions for present or existing buildings and new buildings, but provisions for substantial increases of compensation throughout the service. It was with those facts in mind that the committee made the recommendations contained in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that this is $50,000 less than the appropriation for the current year, in spite of the fact that 100 more buildings are coming in next year, as well as the fact that it is for the maintenance of buildings that have been furnished heretofore. I am content, so far as I am concerned, but the committee will not act ignorantly in the premises.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, what has been said in regard to this appropriation makes still clearer the fact that this bill, alleging to appropriate for sundry civil expenses for the next fiscal year, is a monumental fraud. It is not what it purports to be. It will not take care of the Government service even in a halting and hobble-skirted manner. The only possible way that janitors and caretakers of public buildings can be paid is by scaling down their salaries.

Gentlemen attempted yesterday to justify their having scaled down continuing appropriations to an eight-month basis on the ground that as they were continuing appropriations it made no difference. But here is an appropriation, ostensibly made to cover a fiscal year, which the gentlemen know will not cover the necessary demands on the Treasury for the fiscal year. The gentlemen in charge of the bill know that perfectly well. We have not had $50,000 more than was needed for this service the present year, and we are going to have 100 new buildings. Yet the appropriation is scaled down $50,000 below what is necessary this year. There is no way to bring the expenditures within that limit except by discharging the caretakers and letting the cobwebs gather and the dirt thicken on the floors and walls of public buildings or else reduce the salaries of these employees.

But I am not surprised that the Democratic side contemplates a reduction of the small salaries of caretakers, janitors, and custodians. They are hopeful that they will be successful in the coming presidential election; and if they are, everybody's income will be reduced except those fortunate enough to hold a Government job. I presume that they think the Government servants ought to suffer along with other people, under the circumstances. It contemplates serving out the same sort of dope to Government employees that the balance of the people would get under a Democratic administration.

As I have heretofore observed, this bill is a fraud; it is not what it purports to be. It does not, can not, and will not pay for the Government service for the fiscal year. The gentlemen responsible for the bill know that it will not. They hope to limp along with this appropriation until the 4th of March next, and then appropriate enough to limp along 16 months thereafter. Of course, the gentlemen expect to get some credit in the campaign for this alleged reduction of expenses. But gentlemen on this side that happen to know about it, and those in the country that happen to know about it, will see that the people understand what a fraud this alleged economy is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 39, line 12, by inserting after the word "of" the words "or less than."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 39, line 12, by inserting after the word "of," at the beginning of the line, the words "or less than."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It will operate to increase the expenditures. It is not a limitation upon the expenditures, but it limits the discretion of the Secretary as to the manner in which he shall employ this labor.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt that the amendment limits the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and no doubt would be subject to a point of order if the paragraph itself were not subject to a point of order. The provision in the bill is not a limit on the appropriation. Here is the provision:

And for the mechanical labor force in connection with said buildings, including carpenters, plumbers, steam fitters, machinists, and painters, but in no case shall the rates of compensation for such mechanical labor force be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed.

That is legislation. That is not a limit on the appropriation; it is a limitation upon the administrative authority of the executive officers. Now, if it is competent in the bill to provide that the rates of compensation shall not be in excess of the rates paid current labor, certainly an amendment proposing that the rates shall not be less than the current labor rates is germane to the provision of the bill; it is to fix by legislative authority the pay of these officials, where now without it it is left to the administrative authority.

I have frequently heard gentlemen on the floor of the House inveigh in very strong language against the practice, which they allege the Government followed, of paying less than current rates to mechanical laborers. I have a curiosity to see whether any of these gentlemen will be found at their place in the Hall of the House defending the proposition which they lately initiated on the floor of the House when no vote could be had.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the provision in the bill is a limitation on the compensation of the officials, and under the Holman rule, granting the statement of the gentleman from Illinois that it is legislation, is in order. The gentleman's proposition by this legislation would provide increased compensation in many instances. His limitation is upon the minimum and not upon the maximum.

Mr. MANN. I know, but any germane provision is in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; under the Holman rule legislation is in order which does certain things. Germane amendments which do not retrench expenditures or reduce salaries of officers would not be in order, even if germane. To be in order they must not only be germane, but must accomplish the purpose set out in the rule.

Mr. MANN. Under the Holman rule this provision is not in order. I did not make the point of order, nor did anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair in deciding the point of order has this to say: Line 11 says the rates of compensation shall not be in "excess" of the present rates. That fixes the maximum. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is to amend line 12 immediately after the word "of" by inserting the words "or less than," in order to fix a minimum, so that it would read, if adopted:

That the compensation shall not be in excess of or less than the rates—

And so forth.

If that amendment were adopted, then the rates would be fixed by this amendment at exactly what they now are, which the Chair thinks is positive affirmative legislation. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Does not the Chair think that the provision in the bill is permanent legislation? Of course, I have no right to cross-examine the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the Chair thinks it is, but that it is within the provisions of Rule XXI.

Mr. MANN. There is no provision in the bill which reduces the compensation of any person.

The CHAIRMAN. It leaves it optional with the one fixing the salary to make it less.

Mr. MANN. The existing law is the same thing. There is nothing in the bill which reduces the compensation. The only way the item could be called in order under the Holman rule is by reduction of the compensation of any person. This item in the bill does not reduce anybody's compensation as it stood in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. But the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would be to affirmatively fix the rate of compensation.

Mr. MANN. That is the question of argument. Suppose the provision in the bill had been that the rate shall not be less than the rates current. Then I should have offered an amendment that they should not be in excess of the rate. Of course the result of that is to provide that the current rate shall be the rate paid, but without naming what the current rate is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is still of the opinion that the amendment amounts to affirmative legislation. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Furniture and repairs of furniture: For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and gas and electric light fixtures, for all public buildings, exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, under the control of the Treasury Department, and for furniture, carpets, gas and electric fixtures for new buildings, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, $800,000. And all furniture now owned by the United States in other public buildings and in buildings rented by the United States shall be used, so far as practicable, whether it corresponds with the present regulation plan for furniture or not.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 40, line 16, by striking out "$800,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$900,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, for the fiscal year 1911 there were appropriated $700,000, with $180,000 of the deficiency, making $880,000. The appropriations for 1912 were $700,000, and the estimates for 1913 are $900,000. I read the following note explaining this estimate:

NOTE.—It is estimated that $300,000 will be required to provide furniture equipment for the three large buildings now approaching completion at New York, N. Y.; Denver, Colo.; and New Orleans, La. But an estimate of $200,000 only in addition is submitted, making a total for the year 1913 of $900,000.

That is, 3 of the 107 buildings that are to come in during the coming year. I believe that the full estimates should be given, and I do not believe that even the $900,000 will do the work required for the public service for the coming fiscal year. I again call the attention of Members who are absent from the House, who are specially interested in buildings and the utilizing of buildings that have been authorized, to the fact that I suspect that when this appropriation is administered the great buildings in New York and Denver and New Orleans will be cared for, probably not for $200,000, but for $300,000, and the rest of us may do what the young lawyers used to do when I was one of them on the country circuit, when we failed to win, namely, avail ourselves of the only remedy and cuss the court.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the most indefensible thing ever done by the Treasury Department was its grossly extravagant expenditure for furniture in the New York customhouse. The furnishings of the New York customhouse are the most extravagant and indefensible ever made in any public building. I have been there and looked at them. The arrangement of the offices there can not be justified. A private secretary or a deputy collector has a room much larger, two or three times as large, as that occupied by the President of the United States, and the furniture in it, put there to keep him from being lonesome, has never been equaled in this country. We do not care to have the New York post office furnished in the same way. We are giving $100,000 more for next year than we gave for this year. The Supervising Architect tried to justify the appropriation of $900,000 for next year by stating that he was not permitted to ask for more than $700,000 for the present year, but he was doing the best he could, and under those circumstances the committee believed that if it declined to add $100,000 to what he was permitted to ask for last year, and with which he was doing the best he could, with no complaint from any part of the United States that any public building was suffering either from lack of furniture or from furniture of a character that is inadequate for the Government service, we perhaps might enforce the introduction of simplification and standardization of furniture which would result beneficially to the public.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman tell us the cost of the New York customhouse?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The New York customhouse—I do not remember.

Mr. AUSTIN. How does it compare with the extravagance mentioned by the gentleman in connection with the contemplated improvement of the customhouse for Boston?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. AUSTIN. I asked the gentleman how it compared in cost and expenditure in the contemplated customhouse for Boston, which the gentleman described the other day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a more expensive customhouse than that at Boston.

Mr. AUSTIN. Expensive figures, statuary, and so forth, all around it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is so much more ornate than necessary that I have never been able to get over the resentment I experience whenever I enter that building. I think we ought to have public buildings of a character commensurate with the dignity and greatness of the United States, but I do not think we should attempt to rival the most luxurious palaces that the civilized world has ever known.

Mr. AUSTIN. Was there any opposition from any source upon the floor of the House at the time this appropriation was made for this expensive customhouse at New York City?

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the appropriation was made nobody, even those desiring the facilities for the transaction of the public service, either contemplated or desired the outrageously extravagant design and finish that was devised for this building by the architect under the Tarsney Act; and the gentleman understands the more extravagant and higher the cost of the building the more profitable it is to the architect. But nobody can see that building—the outside of it I do not think can be criticized, but the inside of it, private offices, other parts of it, in my opinion, are absolutely indefensible from any standpoint whatever.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a more impressive building to view on the outside than the Congressional Library.

Mr. AUSTIN. I agree with what the gentleman says in regard to its appearance because I have been through it.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think that the extravagance, of which I know nothing except what the gentleman says, in furnishing the new New York customhouse in any excuse for withholding appropriations for plain furnishings for the new buildings that will come into commission?

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it does not say for plain furniture, unfortunately. If the gentleman had moved to amend this provision by inserting the word "plain" instead of increasing the amount, perhaps we might have gone with him into that limitation, but the Supervising Architect submitted an estimate last year for $700,000 to furnish the buildings coming into commission this year. He is doing very well with that sum. He thought then that he should have asked for more, but his superiors would not permit him to submit the estimates. Now, for the next year he asked $900,000, a very substantial increase, about 37 or 38 per cent, and the committee thought that if instead of giving $900,000 they would give $800,000, an increase of $100,000, it might result in preventing some unjustifiable extravagances in the furnishings of these buildings that have been nortorious not only in the New York customhouse, but I think in the famous Cleveland post office and a building at San Francisco, and at some other places. We should do what is proper, but we should not squander the public money.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with all that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has said, except I am not prepared to give my approval even to the outside appearance of the New York customhouse. It would be a very much handsomer building if it had less ornamentation, particularly the rail at the top, which cuts off half the windows, unless you are back nearly half a mile so as to get a perspective and see the mansard roof in its true proportions. I do not believe there has been anywhere in Government expenditures as much money badly expended as in the public buildings of the United States, both in the appearance of those buildings and the cost of them, and Government buildings are built of exceedingly costly material. They are built in the monumental type and on the theory they are to last indefinitely, and then having made an unusual cost for the building itself, the architect proceeds to make that cost the basis for an unusually large allowance for furnishings, and if we never hurt the Government of the United States any worse than when we curtail some of the expenditures of the Supervising Architect's Office, we will have done little harm in our day and generation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, next winter I suppose we will have a good deal of talk from gentlemen on both sides of the aisle because their building has not been furnished or some other complaint against the Supervising Architect's office, and in order to help allay that trouble I shall ask, if my colleague does not, a division on this amendment, in order that the RECORD may show that the few faithful Members who are here expressed their opinion in the absence of a large number of grumblers who will be kicking next winter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 22, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTOMS SERVICE.

To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, $4,650,000, being additional to the permanent appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913. And the provisions of the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Stats., p. 386), as amended by the act of April 27, 1904 (33 Stats., p. 396), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to expend out of the appropriation for defraying the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs such amount as he may deem necessary, not exceeding $150,000 per annum, for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, are hereby further amended so as to increase the amount to be so expended for the fiscal year 1913 to $200,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is to be followed by a provision to reorganize the customs service. There is a permanent appropriation for the customs service of $5,500,000. This proposes, in addition to that, or recommends, $4,650,000. I do not know why it should not recommend $5,000,000, and then it would be half a million under what it is costing. Gentlemen may say that they expect legislation reorganizing the customs service by which there will be a saving in this amount, but it is just as well, if it works as well in saving as they think it will, to omit the $4,650,000 altogether and let us stand upon the permanent appropriation of $5,500,000. Of course, I apprehend we can not hope for legislation, although I apprehend the House will pass this proposed legislation. But there has been much talk about repealing this permanent appropriation and abolishing a whole lot of customhouses, and all that kind of thing—ripping it up—and I do not know but that, in part, it ought to be ripped up, because it costs $3 to collect the customs revenue to where it costs $1 to collect the internal revenue.

And I want to compliment the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] for one provision, to be found on page 44, which we just passed—a reduction of the amount to detect frauds in the internal revenue of $140,000, notwithstanding the great temptation to avoid payment of revenues that are going to the high tax upon alcohol. But, lo and behold, here is a provision, amounting to $150,000 per annum, for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, amended so as to increase the amount to be so expended for the fiscal year 1913 to $200,000.

I have no doubt most of those frauds that are committed are committed in the city of New York, where the great bulk of this revenue is collected and that come under the close notice of the gentleman who represents——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois is aware this is not an increase at all, although it would appear so. This provision has been carried for the last four or five years.

Mr. CANNON. At $150,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At $200,000 a year, but made available year by year by language similar to this. This is not an increase at all of this sum. It is making available the same amount that has been made available for the past four or five years.

Mr. CANNON. It has been $200,000 for the past four or five years?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And this is to continue the expending of the $200,000. That is to say, the gentleman proposes to authorize $150,000 more for the prevention of frauds in the collection of customs, substantially all of which are collected at New York, than for the whole service of the internal-revenue collections scattered over the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman object to this expenditure for this purpose?

Mr. CANNON. No; it is only for what happens under our noses that we care for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows it is very necessary, considering the conditions disclosed in the public service under Republican officials in the port of New York during the last half dozen years.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes. There were great frauds there, and admittedly great frauds in the collection of the internal revenue. You cut one and let the other remain. So the wide world wags.

Now, I withdraw the pro forma amendment, and I will offer an amendment striking out, in line 14, page 43, "$4,650,000" and inserting "$5,500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 43, line 14, by striking out "$4,650,000" and inserting "$5,500,000."

Mr. CANNON. That is what it costs—namely, $5,500,000, annual appropriation—to reenforce the permanent appropriation of $5,500,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman might have asked for the estimate of the department. They ask for $5,000,000 on their own responsibility; in addition to what the Treasury Department asks the gentleman is asking $500,000, and it is assuming a good deal, in view of his insistence that we should take the estimates of the department.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, for the present the five millions and the deficiency estimated for make it cost in round numbers $5,500,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it is not certain that the deficiency will be granted.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; it is not certain, but while I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet, if I desired to become a prophet I would say that every dollar of it would be appropriated for.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Compensation in lieu of moieties: For compensation in lieu of moieties in certain cases under the customs revenue laws, $50,000.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some remarks in reference to this section, on page 45. I want to submit some observations upon this item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit, I was going to move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARNER. Then I will defer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted, by unanimous consent, as follows:

To Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. POWERS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I referred in debate to a document which I intended to print in my remarks, and I omitted to present a request for unanimous consent to that end. I now ask unanimous consent to print it in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. How long is it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it is not very short. But it is a very instructive and valuable document.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has referred to the document in his speech. Is not that sufficient?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I had not intended to append it to my remarks I would have read it into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to insert a document in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIX, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

S. 6899. An act increasing the limit of cost for the erection and completion of a public building in the city of Richford, State of Vermont.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 9061. An act limiting hours of daily services of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, June 10, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior recommending that authority be granted to credit the account of the chief disbursing officer of the Interior Department with certain items paid by him (H. Doc. No. 822); to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting claim for damages to the yacht Dolphin caused by United States dredge boat Cumberland, and recommending an appropriation therefor (H. Doc. No. 823); to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 10, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23626) to appropriate $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to equip all Army transports with all lifeboats and rafts necessary to accommodate every person for which transportation facilities are now provided on said transports and the crews of said transports.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13041) to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 8.

Memorial to the Congress of the United States, requesting the passage of Senate bill No. 6501 and House bill No. 23775, amending section 13 of the act of June 20, 1910, being "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a State government," etc., and providing for two in lieu of one judicial district in New Mexico.

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill, introduced in the Senate by Hon. ALBERT B. FALL, Senator from New Mexico, and a bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Hon. GEORGE CURRY, Congressman from New Mexico, amending the act heretofore passed to enable the people of New Mexico to form a State government, so as to provide for two judicial districts instead of one; and

Whereas the speedy passage of said bill by the present Congress is very important for the following and other reasons:

1. Great distance between points of holding court: On account of lack of railroad connection between the city of Santa Fe and other parts of the State, the present arrangement involves great expense of time and money on the part of the United States as well as litigants in going to and returning from the place of holding such court and transporting witnesses and jurors to an extent greater than the cost of maintaining an additional district.

2. Government reclamation projects: The said State of New Mexico has developed very rapidly within the last 10 years, and in no part of it has the growth been greater than in that portion included within the proposed southern district, and the location therein of three great Government reclamation projects, to wit, the Rio Grande project, the Hondo project, and the Carlsbad project, being the only projects in the State of New Mexico, promises an era of growth in the near future well justifying the creation of this district.

3. Large areas of Government land: Aside from the great irrigation projects above referred to, the first of which will be in course of construction for several years to come, at the expense of the Government, the district includes immense bodies of Government lands, in fact, nearly all the Government land now open to settlement in the State is located in this district, and contests between the Government and private claimants, exclusive of cases coming within the jurisdiction of the United States land offices, would constitute a considerable amount of business for such court.

4. Forest reserves: It will appear upon investigation that thousands of acres of lands have been included within national forest reserves located principally in what would be the northern district, and the leasing, management, and control of the timber and grazing privileges thereon and controversies growing out of the same would come in such courts.

5. Mineral lands: The proposed amendment is necessary also on account of the great bodies of mineral lands in both of said districts, the operation of mines being one of the great industries of the State and rapidly increasing.

6. Indians and Indian property: New Mexico has perhaps more Indians and more Indian reserves than any other State in the Union, with the exception of Oklahoma, and over these and their property such courts would have jurisdiction.

7. Chinese-exclusion acts: The proposed southern district includes what is known as the "border counties"—that is, counties near the Mexico line—and violation of the Chinese-exclusion acts, and what is known as smuggling cases, has heretofore occupied the attention of the four United States courts which were held therein under Territorial government.

8. Conditions in Mexico: The present state of affairs in Mexico and the proximity of this State to the frontier thereof and the ease with which the neutrality and other laws applying to such conditions can be violated makes the constant supervision of a Federal court at Las Cruces almost imperative.

9. The great development in New Mexico during the past 10 years has brought investments by residents of other States in mining, agricultural, and live-stock properties of considerable magnitude, and an investigation of the dockets of the different State courts will show that about a fourth of the business in the Pecos Valley counties, and almost an equal amount in the counties of Dona Ana and Grant could be removed into the Federal court on the ground of diversity of citizenship, and probably would be so removed were it not for the expense of transporting witnesses, etc., therein.

10. Communication between Roswell and Santa Fe: It is about 500 miles from Roswell to Santa Fe by rail and about 600 from Carlsbad to Santa Fe; the round trip takes at least three days and often four or five when good connection is not made, and the minimum cost of taking a witness to Santa Fe is about $50.

Now therefore (if the house of representatives concur) be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, That the Congress of the United States be earnestly requested to pass Senate bill No. 6501 and House bill No. 23775, each entitled "A bill to amend section 13 of the act of June 20, 1910," being "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a State government," etc., and providing for two in lieu of one judicial districts in New Mexico, at its present session;

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to Hon. ALBERT B. FALL and Hon. THOMAS B. CATRON, Senators from New Mexico, and to Hon. GEORGE CURRY, Member of Congress from New Mexico, and to Hon. H. B. FERGUSSON, Member of Congress from New Mexico.

E. C. DE BACA,
President of the Senate.
JOHN JOERNS,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
ROMAN L. BACA,
Speaker of the House.
FRANK STAPLIN,
Chief Clerk of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the adoption of a 1-cent letter postage, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I present a telegram, in the nature of a resolution, adopted by the New York State Convention of Letter Carriers May 31, 1912, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELMIRA, N. Y., June 4, 1912.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was passed at the New York State Convention of Letter Carriers May 31, 1912:

Whereas we firmly believe that the establishment of an 8-hour workday within 10 consecutive hours will prove beneficial both to the Post Office Department and its employees, insuring as it does the greater efficiency that comes from a contented body of workers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New York State Association of Letter Carriers record its approval of section 5 of the Post Office appropriation bill, and expresses the hope that the Senate in consideration of this measure will make no material change there.

B. M. SHERMAN, Secretary.

Mr. O'GORMAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., remonstrating against an appropriation being made to be used for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation to maintain the present water rates in the District, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CATRON. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, recommending the creation of two judicial districts in that State, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A duplicate of the memorial has been presented by the Vice President and ordered printed in the RECORD. Of course the memorial will be printed in the RECORD but once.

Mr. CATRON. Very well. I wish to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to that committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wallace, Mich., praying for the establishment of a parcel-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Jackson, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for a five-year tenure of office for civil-service employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Wyandotte and Detroit, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OLIVER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation providing reservations in Alaska for the Indians of that Territory, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of members of the Pittsburgh Branch, National League of Commission Merchants of the United States, of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the adoption of a uniform bill of lading, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of members of the Manufacturers' Association of Erie, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the ownership of buildings by the United States in foreign countries for the use of its representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Erie, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to enable the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, acting through the Bureau of Corporations, to make a complete investigation of the business of foreign and domestic fire insurance corporations in the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Merchants' Association of Manila, P. I., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to restrict the sale of the friar lands in the Philippine Islands, which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented a petition of Penn Grange, No. 1485, Patrons of Husbandry, of Dickinson, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for vocational education, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Virden, Ill., remonstrating against the extension of the parcel-post system beyond its present limitations, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McLEAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Danbury and Naugatuck, in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against an appropriation being made to be used for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Plainville, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide medical and sanitary relief for the natives of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of sundry members of the Ladies of the Maccabees of the World, residents of Waterbury, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation granting to the publications of fraternal associations the privileges of second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WETMORE presented a memorial of members of the Sarsfield Literary Association, of Woonsocket, R. I., remonstrating against an appropriation being made to be used for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RAYNER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM presented a memorial of members of the South Park Ranchmen's Protective Association, of Colorado, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation permitting the cutting of timber from the Platte watershed by the Forest Service, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GORE (for Mr. OWEN) presented a petition of members of the Davis County Medical Society, of Utah, praying for the passage of the so-called Owen health bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRADLEY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Sonora, Ky., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transmission of race gambling bets, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Sonora, Ky., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROOT presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, remonstrating against the proposed discontinuance of the appropriations for the Bureau of Trade Relations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Canajoharie, Fishkill, Highland Falls, Hudson Falls, Ossining, Peekskill, Silver Creek, and Yonkers, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Owen health bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

STEAMER "DAMARA."

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 7015) to provide American registry for the steamer Damara, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 867) thereon.

PICTURES OF PRIZE FIGHTS, ETC.

Mr. BACON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 7027) to prohibit the transportation of pictures of prize fights, and for other purposes, and I shall ask present consideration thereof. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful to send or receive, by mail, railway, express, water service, or in any other manner, from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to bring into this country from any foreign country, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, or any record or account of betting on the same. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be punished by imprisonment for not exceeding one year or a fine of not exceeding $1,000, at the discretion of the court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. The word "receive" occurs. I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill explain why we should penalize the person who receives it, because we receive a lot of things through the mails involuntarily.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator desires it, I will not now ask for the present consideration of the bill. I will state to the Senator that there is an urgent reason for the early action of Congress in this matter, but one day will not make much difference. There is an identical bill pending in the House, and for that, I understand, the House committee has offered a substitute which is probably better in its terms than this measure. The matter was brought to the attention of the Judiciary Committee, and the only purpose in presenting it now without amendment was to endeavor to expedite it, the anticipation being that probably the House substitute would be ultimately adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the bill, except as to the word "receive," which might be used as a trap. That a man shall be penalized for receiving something through the mails is rather a dangerous proposition. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust that the Senator from Georgia may allow it to go over. I am not sure that it ought not to be somewhat enlarged. There are other things besides the exhibition of prize fights that are demoralizing in these picture shows.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that I shall not object to the bill going over, although I hope we may have early consideration of it. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is the author of the bill.

I will state to the Senator that while what he says in regard to the propriety of enlarging it is true, still that is possibly not so urgent as this legislation. This is a special matter that has attracted the attention of the public, and there are some impending performances that it is intended, if possible, to reach.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was attracted by the suggestion the Senator made that another body has under consideration a similar bill. The Senate passed a bill months ago giving the Commissioners of the District of Columbia jurisdiction—or, at least, giving them authority to examine the films that were being used in these moving-picture shows. It is an utter abomination the way things are going on here in the District in that regard. Yet that bill has lain dormant or has been lost sight of in some way, and no action is taken on it. I think I will agree with the Senator——

Mr. BACON. I hope the bill the Senator refers to may be brought up and acted upon, but that it will not be complicated with this measure, because that would involve some delay.

Mr. GALLINGER. I promise the Senator——

Mr. BACON. It is suggested by the author of the bill and also by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who is on the Judiciary Committee, that if the word "willfully" was put in as a prefix to the word "receive" it would relieve it from the just criticism offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GALLINGER. I promise the Senator that I will not complicate the bill at all. I think it is legislation in the proper direction.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no desire to delay the consideration of the bill, but——

Mr. BACON. If the word "willfully" were put in——

Mr. GALLINGER. Knowingly.

Mr. BACON. Or knowingly.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not in this bill.

Mr. BACON. If we could amend it to that extent, so as to read "knowingly or willfully receive," will the Senator still desire that it shall go over?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not considered just how sufficient those words of limitation would be.

Mr. BACON. The Senator prefers to have the bill go over?

Mr. HEYBURN. It had better go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

By Mr. REED:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 115) to forfeit to the United States the Merchants' Bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, to operate said bridge as a free public bridge, directing the Secretary of War to take possession of said bidge, and forfeiting the rights granted to the St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Co. by the acts of February 3, 1887, and September 10, 1888; to the Committee on Commerce.

INTERVENTION IN CUBAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BACON. I introduce a bill, which I ask may be read.

The bill (S. 7075) authorizing the President of the United States to use the Army and Navy of the United States for the maintenance of Government in Cuba adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the duly constituted civil authorities of the Government of Cuba shall inform the President of the United States that there exists a rebellion or resistance to the authority of law in Cuba such as the Cuban Government is itself unable to subdue and control, and shall request the assistance of the United States for that purpose, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to use the Army and Navy of the United States, or so much thereof as in his discretion he may deem to be necessary, to subdue said rebellion and enforce obedience to the then existing Government and laws of Cuba.

SEC. 2. Whenever there shall exist in the island of Cuba a condition of rebellion and civil disorder, and it shall appear that the Government of Cuba is inadequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for the maintenance of law and order, and the duly constituted authorities of Cuba shall fail and omit to request the assistance of the United States to suppress such rebellion and disorder, the President of the United States is hereby authorized, if Congress shall not then be in session, to use in his discretion, the Army and Navy of the United States, or so much thereof as he may deem to be necessary, to subdue said rebellion and restore order and obedience to the then existing civil Government and laws of Cuba.

SEC. 3. Whenever, under the authority hereinbefore granted, the military and naval forces of the United States are used for the suppression of rebellion and for the restoration and maintenance of order in Cuba, in no event shall the civil Government then existing in Cuba be subverted or the civil officers of the Government of Cuba removed or supplanted, nor shall any officer be appointed to perform the duties of a civil officer in Cuba without the authority of an act of Congress of the United States.

SEC. 4. That whenever the Army and Navy of the United States shall be used as aforesaid in said island of Cuba the military and naval operations conducted and executed in pursuance thereof shall be under the direction, management, and control of the President of the United States.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before moving the reference, I wish to say one word in regard to the provisions of the bill.

It is quite evident on account of the recurring disorders in Cuba that we are frequently to be met with the question as to what the United States shall do under the authority which they have by reason of the Platt amendment in order to maintain in Cuba permanent Government, and a Government which shall protect life, liberty, and property in that island. The purpose of the bill is, if possible, to enact legislation which will accomplish that end and in so doing do the greatest good which can be done to Cuba and at the same time do the least harm to the United States.

The first proposition contained in the bill is one which looks to what would be denominated only, I presume, a partial intervention, in that it does not authorize the overturning of an existing Cuban Government. It only provides for responding to a request from the Government of Cuba, whenever it is in a condition where it can not deal with a rebellion or with disorder, that the United States shall come to its assistance for the purpose only of suppressing rebellion and for restoring order, and in that way maintain the existing civil Government of Cuba. The first section of the bill provides that in that case the President of the United States may use the Army and Navy of the United States for that purpose, the purpose in so doing being asserted to be to maintain the then existing Government in Cuba, and not to subvert it and put another Government in the place of it.

Another provision in the bill is that in case such a condition of affairs exists and Cuba shall fail to ask for the assistance of the United States, when the Congress of the United States is not in session the President of the United States may proceed in a similar way, the object of the proceeding in such being, as in the former case, not to subvert a Government, but to maintain the Government which is then found in Cuba.

The provision goes further and provides that in neither of these cases shall the authority of the United States be used to subvert an existing Government or to supplant any civil officers who are found to be there, the object being to maintain the Government of Cuba, and not to subvert it.

I want to say, Mr. President, that there are several reasons why I think that limitation should be put upon whatever steps are taken for the use of the Army and Navy in Cuba in that view. I believe, in the first place, that whenever it is known in Cuba that the Army and Navy of the United States can be secured, upon the request of the Government of Cuba, for the purpose of suppressing rebellion and maintaining order it will operate as a very great deterrent upon those who might otherwise wish to foment and prosecute revolution. The revolutionists will not be eager to stir up a rebellion when it is known that the United States Army will in one week sweep them off the face of the earth. In the second place, if it is limited to the putting down of rebellion and the maintenance of the existing Government, the Cubans will not be so sensitive upon the question of the possibility of an intervention on the part of the United States. I do not think the Cubans will be sensitive to the fact that the United States comes to the assistance of a Cuban Government to support and maintain that Government, although they are sensitive as to an intervention which may lead to a subversion of their Government and not to its maintenance. They have the precedent already established by this Government of going there and practically subverting that Government and turning out its officers and establishing there an American autocracy, as was done, and naturally they are sensitive and apprehensive whenever intervention is suggested.

I think, Mr. President, that to subvert an existing Government in Cuba is a very great mistake, for two reasons. In the first place, it puts a premium upon rebellion and upon revolution when the idea can be presented that by so doing the assistance of the Government of the United States can be obtained for the purpose of overturning the Government to which they object—the very object which the revolutionists seek to accomplish.

A more serious objection, though—that is, more serious to us—is one growing out of the influence and, I might almost say the consequence, of the subversion of the Cuban Government and the supplanting of their officers with officers of the United States, as was done upon the former occasion. The necessary influence of that and almost the certain consequence of it, if it is repeated, will be the annexation of the island—a thing which I above all things deprecate. If they become accustomed to the sight of the civil officers of that island being displaced by the officers of the United States, as was done in the former case, there is very little doubt about what ultimately will result. For that reason, as well as for others, I think it is well to thus limit the function of the United States by law when sending troops into Cuba, except when hereafter the Congress might deem it wise to do otherwise—to limit it to the act of suppressing rebellion and assisting the civil authorities in that island to restore order and maintain their Government. That, in fact, I think, was the contemplation of the Platt amendment, because that is the language of it—to maintain a government for the protection of life, liberty, and property, and so on. I am not quoting accurately the words, but the words "the maintenance of the government" are in it.

I do not pretend, Mr. President, that this is all the legislation that is required on this subject. I think a great deal more is required, because there are some other features of the Platt amendment which look to other contingencies than the matter of rebellion and disorder. I think Congress has been very remiss—and I take my full share of the criticism—in not having legislated upon this subject before this time; it has been with us now for 12 years; and we have failed to do that which I think we ought to have done in enacting the required legislation.

I repeat, I do not pretend that this bill is complete by any means, but it meets that part of the question which is now most acute, and will, I hope, lead to a consideration of the question in all of its branches and features.

I only make this statement now, Mr. President, in order that the introduction of this bill may not be misunderstood nor its terms misconstrued. As I have heretofore said, I think the proper authority should be vested in the President of the United States. I do not think there is now any authority of law in him to take action. I think that it requires legislation by Congress. I think in vesting that authority we should properly limit it in such a way as to accomplish that which, as I said in the beginning, would be the greatest good to Cuba and the least harm to ourselves. We should so limit that authority as to make it impossible under it to overturn the civil government of Cuba.

I hope, Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Foreign Relations Committee has already been charged with the general consideration of this question, that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of one messenger in the office of the major general commandant, Marine Corps, from $971.28 per annum to $1,200 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 24565), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 21226) relating to compensation of clerks of United States district courts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CANNON.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 24458) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to deliver to certain cities and towns condemned bronze or brass cannon, with their carriages and outfit of cannon balls, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

DECISIONS OF COMMERCE COURT.

Mr. BURTON. I present a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 338), as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate a list of cases decided by the United States Commerce Court, together with a summary of questions of law and of fact decided in each.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he also include in the resolution an inquiry as to what disposition was made of those cases on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, if they were so appealed.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to modify the resolution by adding "together with a further list of cases appealed to the Supreme Court from the Commerce Court."

Mr. CULBERSON. And also what disposition was made of them by the Supreme Court.

Br. BURTON. And also "appealed to the Supreme Court and the disposition made thereof." I have no objection to adding that language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The modification of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution the following words:

Together with a list of cases appealed to the Supreme Court and the disposition thereof.

Mr. CULBERSON. The words "from the Commerce Court" should be inserted unless that language already appears.

Mr. BURTON. I think that would necessarily follow from the wording of the resolution. The word "also" might be inserted instead of "together."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps it would be better that the Secretary should read the resolution as proposed to be modified.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I make a suggestion before the resolution is read so that the Senator from Ohio will have it in mind? In each case decided by the Commerce Court there has been a printed opinion which shows exactly what the case is and upon what grounds it has been decided. I think, if the Attorney General attempts to state the case and the points in it, the grounds on which it has been decided, he ought to attach a copy of the opinion of the Commerce Court itself, so that any differences of opinion that may exist can be cleared up by a comparison of the opinion of the court with the statement of the Attorney General.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I take it for granted that the list of cases and decisions will be transmitted with the reply. It will be noted that there is no syllabus with these reports, and the aim of this resolution is to have a brief summary of the points decided, so as to make it easier for one who desires to study the cases decided by the Commerce Court.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I do not intend to object, it seems to me that it is rather an unnecessary thing to impose on the Attorney General the duty of making syllabi for the opinions of the Commerce Court. We all have those opinions, and they show precisely the facts as well as the law as held by the Commerce Court. I have no objection to it; but I think that when Senators receive this information they ought to at once attach it to the opinions themselves, so that they can be informed with regard to what the court thinks.

Mr. BURTON. The object is to have a brief statement. Of course for a more elaborate study each Senator will give such time as he can to the published reports.

Mr. JONES. I should also like to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that this statement should contain the date of the commencement of each suit in the Commerce Court and the date of the final decision rendered by the court.

Mr. BURTON. I have no objection to that. I wish to modify the resolution by adding "also the date of the commencement of each case and of the decision."

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the opinions show that in each case.

Mr. JONES. I thought while we were getting this information in compact form it would be well to have this also.

The SECRETARY. So that if amended the resolution would read:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate a list of cases decided by the United States Commerce Court, together with a summary of questions of law and of fact decided in each, giving the date of the commencement of each case and the decision thereon, and also a list of cases appealed from said Commerce Court to the Supreme Court of the United States and the disposition of each.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the resolution should include a statement of the cases pending. After the word "decided," the words "and pending" should be inserted, so that we will have a comprehensive knowledge of the business of the court.

Mr. BURTON. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "United States Commerce Court," insert "and pending before said court."

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the resolution will be so modified.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, one other suggestion. I notice that the resolution requests and directs. It is not customary for the Senate to request any information of a Cabinet officer, but to direct him to furnish it. I care nothing about it, because the word "directed" is used, but the word "requested" is also used. It seems to me that the word "requested" ought to be stricken out so as to conform to the usage of the Senate in such cases.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think that the usage is not uniform in that regard. Distinctive phraseology is usually employed in calls for information from the State Department. The resolutions usually read "be requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest," but resolutions directed to other departments have the word "requested" or "directed" alone, or sometimes the words "requested and directed." It seems to me that is a matter of phraseology that does not assume any special importance, and I hope the Senator from Texas will not insist upon it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, I do not insist upon it, but I still say that it is inconsistent with the usage of the Senate to request the Attorney General or any other officer of the Cabinet, outside of the Secretary of State. The Senate has the power to direct, and has seen proper to do so in all cases heretofore.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the resolution as modified.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate a list of cases decided by the United States Commerce Court, together with a summary of questions of law and of fact decided in each, giving the date of the commencement of each case and the decision of the court thereon; and also a list of cases now pending before said court; and also a list of the cases appealed from said Commerce Court to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the disposition of each.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution as modified is agreed to.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION (S. DOC. NO. 785).

Mr. O'GORMAN. I present a paper signed by Moe Lenkowsky and Anton Kaufman, chairman and secretary of the Citizens Committee of Orchard, Rivington, and East Houston Streets, New York City, relative to a statement contained in the annual report of the commissioner of immigration for the port of New York, as to the condition of the people residing on these streets. Accompanying the paper is a statement of the social centers, professions, industrial and mercantile establishments on East Houston Street between Broadway and East River, Rivington Street between Bowery and East River, and Orchard Street between Division and East Houston Streets. I ask that the paper be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

EQUALIZATION OF CREEK ALLOTMENTS (S. DOC. NO. 786).

Mr. GORE. I present a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitting a report on a proposed amendment to the bill (S. 4947) providing for the equalization of Creek allotments, together with a copy of the form of contract and power of attorney. I ask that the papers be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I give notice that on Wednesday, June 12, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24665) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

JOHN C. SCHOLTZ (H. DOC. NO. 824).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit Mr. John C. Scholtz, a citizen of Venezuela, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point at the expense of the Government of Venezuela.

The Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of Venezuela and that it would follow established precedents.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 10, 1912.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE (H. DOC. NO. 825).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a communication from the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting a report by the auditor of the District of Columbia in relation to a charge of $769,536.09, which by the terms of the sundry civil bill as reported to the House of Representatives it is proposed to deduct from the revenues of the District of Columbia and reimburse to the United States on account of certain deficiencies in payments made by the District to the Government Hospital for the Insane.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 10, 1912.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

On June 7, 1912:

S. 2530. An act granting to the city of Twin Falls, Idaho, certain lands for reservoir purposes;

S. 6508. An act to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in the Chuckawalla Valley, Cal.; and

S. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution making provision for the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations.

On June 10, 1912:

S. 5910. An act granting to the city of Portland, Oreg., certain strips of land from the post-office and customhouse sites in said city for street purposes;

S. 6848. An act authorizing the Cooper River Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Goose Creek, in Berkeley County, S. C.; and

S. J. Res. 97. Joint resolution authorizing the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography to occupy temporary structures erected by the American Red Cross and to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

FORT HUACHUCA MILITARY RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6798) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permission for the erection of a hotel on the Fort Huachuca Military Reservation, in Arizona.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to grant permission to C. L. Douglas, of Fairbank, Ariz., to build a hotel upon the lands of the United States at Fort Huachuca military post, Ariz., upon such site and with such plans and dimensions as may be approved by the Secretary of War, and to occupy for that purpose such portion of the military reservation at Fort Huachuca as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War; but the operation of the hotel shall be subject to such regulations as to police, good order, and sanitation as may from time to time be prescribed by the officer commanding at Fort Huachuca, and the building or buildings erected shall be removed at the expense of the owners whenever the Secretary of War shall so direct, and no claim for damages by reason of such removal shall be made upon the Government of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the Army appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the report is before the Senate. The conference report has heretofore been read, as the Chair is advised.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I presume that every Member of this body is aware of the fact that there have been numerous and very serious differences of opinion between the Senate and the House of Representatives in regard to many of the provisions of the Army appropriation bill. Indeed, so radical were these differences that some had thought that it would be found impossible to reconcile them, with the result that the bill would fail.

I am glad to say, Mr. President, that after many conferences extending over several weeks an agreement has been reached on every point in dispute, as embodied in the conference report herewith submitted. So far as this report is concerned, necessarily it does not reflect, in many particulars, the individual and personal views of the managers on the part of the Senate, nor, I am bound to say, does it represent those of the managers on the part of the House. To reach an adjustment of the many points in dispute it was necessary to give as well as to take; but I believe that it can be confidently stated, so far as the Senate is concerned, that the very best obtainable terms have been secured.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this conference report presents certain considerations which never have been presented by any conference report that I have ever seen presented to the Senate. It is well known that attached to this Army appropriation bill as it came from the House was a complete statute reorganizing the Army. That portion of the bill the Committee on Military Affairs struck out and the Senate sustained their action. I had supposed at the time—and I know that that was the view of many other Senators—that this portion of the bill was stricken out because the Senate did not agree with the placing upon appropriation bills of general legislation of an extensive character which no emergency demanded. The Senate, without discussion, assented to the removal of that portion of the bill, and very generally, I believe, on that understanding.

The result has been, the conferees having discussed it and reframed it in conference, that this important legislation, covering a complete reorganization of the Army, or a very large reorganization of the Army, comes before the Senate at that stage where it can not be amended in any respect, and the Senate has never had an opportunity to discuss any feature of this reorganization statute or to modify it or pass upon it in any way whatsoever.

Mr. President, I do not believe, as a principle, in attaching legislation of this character to appropriation bills. The opposite principle has been followed by both Houses for many years, and I think it is a sound one. Our own rules provide against it, and the House rules provided against it until the present session.

I think on the principle there can be no debate that general legislation should not be yoked with appropriation bills for the present year. But if it is to be done, it certainly makes it far worse to have the legislation stricken out in the Senate in March and then reconstructed in conference and brought to the Senate at a time when the Senate can neither modify nor amend it in any respect whatsoever.

I, for one—and I do not express the slightest lack of confidence in the Senate conferees—I, for one, do not think that the Senate ought to be deprived of its right upon legislation of this character. I think the Senate has the same interest in a large question of this kind that the House has, and therefore I do not think it ought to abdicate its functions.

But we are now in the position where we can do nothing in the way of amending or modifying the bill reported from the conference. It is unamendable. There is contained in it, as I shall presently show, new legislation; that is, legislation that was not before either House and legislation not germane to any differences arising between the Houses.

In the House of Representatives the point of order has been frequently sustained by the Chair when made against new legislation in a conference report. The practice in the Senate has been somewhat different. Where the point of new legislation has been made—that is, legislation on a matter not submitted to the conference—the Senate has passed upon the question and dealt with it approvingly, by agreeing to the conference report; or, if it has disapproved and objected to the new legislation being inserted, by rejecting the report and returning it to conference.

At this stage it is almost impossible to argue this bill in detail as I should like to discuss it. There are many points in this legislation open to discussion which if I had known were to be dealt with in conference, much as I object to this manner of legislation, I should like to have discussed when it was in the Senate—such questions as the length of term of enlistment.

But I find in this bill absolutely new legislation. One provision which has attracted the most attention, and justly so, is the provision with regard to the Chief of Staff. There was nothing whatever in the bill submitted by the House changing the tenure of the Chief of Staff, as I understand, from that fixed by the terms of the present law, and I have read it with some care.

Mr. WARREN. That was not the view of the Chief of Staff, as I shall show presently. He considered that there was a proposition from the House to which he objected, and the new legislation proposed is entirely germane to the subject matter that came before us from the House, which was not satisfactory to the Secretary of War; was not satisfactory to the Chief of Staff, and the Chief of Staff gave some of the reasons why it was not, and one was because it left an indefinite term for the Chief of Staff.

Mr. LODGE. The present law, as I am informed, provides that at the end of four years the Chief of Staff shall return to his duties in the line, and that after two years he may be reappointed. I am unable to find—if I can put my fingers on it in this somewhat cumbrous bill——

Mr. BRISTOW. Page 67.

Mr. LODGE. Thank you.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; that is not it.

Mr. LODGE. I have the amendment, but I want to find the original bill.

Mr. WARREN. There are several pages of it.

Mr. LODGE. I know. I am trying to put my hand on it.

Mr. DU PONT. It is section 3.

Mr. LODGE. I want to find the provision in the House bill in regard to the Chief of Staff. No. 73 is the amendment, but surely it is not wholly new. There was something about the Chief of Staff in the original bill.

Mr. WARREN. A good deal about it.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I thought and that is what I am trying to put my hand on.

Mr. DU PONT. Page 67.

Mr. LODGE. Or page 57?

Mr. DU PONT. No; it is 67.

Mr. LODGE. Now, the bill as it came from the House provided this:

> And no officer who shall have served four years as Chief of Staff shall, except in case of emergency or in time of war, be eligible for further service as Chief of Staff until after he shall have served for at least two years with the line of the Army or on such other duty not pertaining to the General Staff Corps as the President may direct.

That is the way the bill came from the House. That, I understand, is the present law.

Now, to that has been added this, which I take to be entirely new matter:

> SEC. 5. That hereafter, except in time of war or when war is imminent, no officer who shall have served four years as Chief of Staff shall be eligible for further service as Chief of Staff until after he shall have served for at least two years with the line of the Army.

Now, this is new matter:

> Neither shall any officer, after the 5th day of March, 1913, be detailed nor be permitted to serve as Chief of Staff unless he shall have served at least 10 years as a commissioned officer of the line of the Army in grades below that of brigadier general.

That is wholly new matter; not, as I understand, a matter of difference.

What may have been the views of the Chief of Staff, or what he may have said, I do not know and I do not care, because I am discussing what I consider a question of order here. There was nothing in that bill putting a limitation upon the officers who should be capable of serving as Chief of Staff. It is open to all the officers of the Army.

Mr. WARREN. No, Mr. President, the Senator will not claim it is open to all the officers of the Army.

Mr. LODGE. Who are excluded?

Mr. WARREN. It is open to general officers only.

Mr. LODGE. Of course. I did not mean it was open to a private soldier.

Mr. WARREN. It is not open to colonels or lieutenant colonels.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that. I meant it was open to every officer who could reach the necessary grade.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I am perfectly willing to have any interruption.

Mr. WARREN. I want the Senator and all Senators to remember that there is a situation now that has not heretofore confronted the Senator who has the floor during his service; nor has it confronted me in my service. We have a House with a very large party majority and a great many new Members, and that majority is not of the same party as the majority of the Senate. They have in their change of rules provided that they can attach legislation to appropriation bills. We have to meet that situation. If we were to say that we would not entertain in any way their propositions of legislation it ought to have been said here before the bill was sent to the conferees to compose the differences.

Mr. LODGE. It was said, for I said it.

Mr. WARREN. We have not only in this bill the same class of amendments and of legislation, but in all of the others. We have the same in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill now under consideration here.

Mr. BRISTOW rose.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will wait a moment. I am speaking in the time of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I want to come to the point.

We were confronted in this legislation by the fact that every Secretary of War, dating back for some years, and every Chief of Staff, the present Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff included, have espoused legislation similar to that in this bill with regard to the service corps and the supply corps. In fact I have here before me in these hearings the early indorsement of the House legislation along that line.

We are confronted with a House that demands legislation; we are confronted with precedents that all the Chiefs of Staff and Secretaries of War have proposed the same; and we not only have to contend here as the conferees of the Senate with the House, but with the War Department itself, and if we are to contend also with the Senate, then I beg the Senate to mark out some place where the conferees can stand and what the Senate expects them to do.

Now, as to the General Staff, I have here the statement of the Chief of Staff, made public in this pamphlet since the House passed on the bill, and here are his observations on the House bill. Speaking of the bill as it came from the House he says:

> It was expected that the General Staff Corps would consist of the ablest line officers of the Army, who would be able to give to the Secretary of War and the President the very best military advice based upon the highest type of military education and experience.
> SECTION 5—REMOVING THE FOUR-YEAR LIMIT IN THE TOUR OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF.
>
> The intent in this section is not at all clear to me, and a number of very peculiar situations would arise under it.
>
> Under the provisions of the proposed legislation certain officers become permanent members of the General Staff Corps. If such an officer is detailed as Chief of Staff, there is no existing law to limit the length of his tour except the length of his active service in the Army.
> The only limit placed by law, the limit on his tour as a member of the General Staff Corps, being removed, he can remain Chief of Staff indefinitely. On the other hand, it may be that the intent of the provision is only to provide that nothing in the proposed legislation shall be held or construed to prevent the selection as Chief of Staff of an officer not a member of the permanent General Staff Corps, but that if such an officer be selected, he shall not serve for more than four years. In either case the legislation is distinctly bad. No reason can exist for providing that a Chief of Staff selected from a small group of 13 permanent bureau officers may have an indefinite tenure of office, while a Chief of Staff selected from the Army at large is limited to a four-year detail.
> A number of other difficulties will arise in an effort to construe this legislation, the principal ones of which are pointed out in a memorandum and printed elsewhere in this report (see p. 40), from which it will be seen that upon the enactment of the proposed legislation the General Staff Corps would be divided into six different classes of officers, each of which would be subject to different laws and regulations with reference to tenure of office and replacement.
> The officers of the General Staff Corps should all be selected in the same manner; should have the same tenure of office; should be subject to the same rules and regulations with reference to detail, relief from detail, and redetail; and every possible step should be taken to prevent perpetuation in office or the growing up of a small coterie of officers to retain the control and to prevent favoritism among its personnel.
> Why is it necessary that the 13 permanent bureau officers should be made members of the General Staff Corps? What reason exists for putting them in a position different from that of the line officers of the Army and providing that they shall have positions on the General Staff which are denied to the great majority of officers of the line? Why, also, should the promotion and rank of these 13 permanent bureau officers be so carefully guarded while the same section throws back into the line to be absorbed 21 officers of the grades of colonel to captain, inclusive? The answer is clear. The permanent bureau officers, by the mere fact of their presence in Washington, have always a powerful influence over Army administration and military legislation. The General Staff as now organized consists principally of line officers and wholly of officers whose tenure of office in Washington is only for a limited time and stands as the real representative of the line of the Army. If the General Staff becomes a semipermanent bureau of the War Department, dominated by bureau officers with permanent commissions therein, where will the line get its representation?

And he goes on claiming that the bill as it came from the House provided that there should be permanent members of the Staff and the Chief of Staff was left so he could serve without limit.

Mr. LODGE. As to the condition of the Senate and the House politically, that is known to everybody. I do not regard the question of the Army or the Navy as political questions. I think they are questions in which we are all equally interested, and if we were to take the ground that the House having put on this new legislation we would be compelled to treat it in conference, that announcement ought to have been before the conference and not afterwards. That whole Army bill went out of here without discussion. There was no suggestion that we should take that into conference and there make a statute—at least no suggestion that I heard from any quarter.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that when the full Committee on Military Affairs considered this bill it considered it from the same point of view. This whole paragraph of new legislation was cut out because the committee had decided that it was legislation reorganizing the Army, and that that feature of the bill was not even discussed in committee.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to say that the Senator from Kansas is laboring under a misapprehension as to the Military Affairs Committee. It is true the Military Committee rejected en bloc the whole legislative provisions of the House, for the reason that otherwise they would not have had control over all the points in dispute, but the statement was repeatedly made in committee that their full discussion in conference was unavoidable, and with this in view the subcommittee of the Military Committee which considered the Army appropriation bill had a number of lengthy hearings of various Army officers.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask who was going to have control over disputed points?

Mr. DU PONT. The conferees.

Mr. LODGE. What would become of the Senate in that arrangement?

Mr. WARREN. The Senate can settle it yes or no.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. DU PONT. During the hearings—and they have been printed—there will be found the statement that we could not avoid that in conference if all these questions were submitted to the conferees. Every member of the committee, I presume, was fully aware of that.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, I have no knowledge of what occurred in committee except the statement that has been made here.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I do not know what the understanding of the Senator from Kansas was, but this is the first time I have heard from any member of the committee that they expected to exclude all legislation when we finished the bill. The Senator knows what has been repeated and never denied, what may be unfortunate but nevertheless is true, that about every appropriation bill which passes carries some legislation. Now, it was distinctly understood in the subcommittee, and, I believe, generally understood in the full committee, that we were to exclude all the legislation possible, and that we were to get the best possible results in the protection of the Army, which I think the conferees did get.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me that when not only the committee of the Senate, but the Senate itself, decided to cut out these paragraphs of important legislation, and when the committee of conference concluded that it was necessary that it should go in in order to satisfy the other branch, that fact should have been submitted to the Senate for it to decide whether or not we should then take up and reconsider those paragraphs and consider them where they would have full consideration other than by the conferees.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, our conferees were not so instructed, and they have not been so instructed heretofore. This is not the first conference I have served on by a great many. When there are instructions for conferees the time for those instructions is, first, before the conferees go into conference, and if they come back with a disagreement to instruct them then.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the point I make is that if the committee had felt that they were obliged to discuss this new legislation in conference they should have so informed the Senate and given the Senate an opportunity to discuss it here before it went to conference, so that the statute reorganizing the Army would have gone to conference as the work of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. It was all here for the Senate to act upon.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me to finish what I was about to say, it came in here all stricken out. I made some remarks of an entirely general character against putting such legislation on appropriation bills. I objected to it strongly. I spoke against it as a bad practice. I said I was glad that the committee had stricken it out. There was some little discussion here in regard to the House rules, and then without a dissenting voice, without the examination of one line of that statute by the Senate, the whole of it was committed to conference.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator contend that after the House of Representatives adopted a rule by which they do place legislation on appropriation bills the Senate should ignore the House of Representatives and not consider that legislation?

Mr. LODGE. I am not contending anything of the kind. I am contending that it is a bad practice to put legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. WARREN. All accept that.

Mr. LODGE. The House has seen fit to reverse the practice of many years. They have an absolute right to do it and we have an equal right to adhere to the old practice if we choose, and to endeavor to get the House to agree with us in dropping such legislation from appropriation bills; but if we are not going to make that effort in conference, if we are to take new legislation into conference, then I say it should be made in the Senate and not in conference. If we are going to yield to the House to put their work in the bill, the Senate on that account should not be deprived of its right to consider the bill. I for one should never have voted to strike out all those clauses without one word of discussion if I had known that they were to be made over in conference.

Mr. WARREN. What did the Senator expect the conferees to do?

Mr. LODGE. I supposed the conferees would object to the whole thing in conference, and, if the House insisted, that they would come back here and ask further instructions from the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Why did not the able Senator from Massachusetts suggest it, then?

Mr. LODGE. Because I never supposed for one moment that anything else would be done.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator had every reason to suppose——

Mr. LODGE. I asked one member of the committee, and that member of the committee said, "No; this was stricken out; we are against legislating in this way."

Mr. WARREN. We are, and we have been.

Mr. LODGE. He told me that the reason was it had not been discussed in committee at all.

Mr. WARREN. But it is the practice of the Senate, and always has been since I have been a Member of it, to submit these matters to conference for a full and free conference, and unless there is objection made and some instructions issued beforehand——

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WARREN. We followed the precedent and followed the custom. Where legislation was stricken out, we kept as much as possible of it out; and we were compelled, in order to compose differences and obtain concessions along other lines, to insert portions of the legislation, and, of course, we had to use different language, as we always do. When a Senator wishes for some reason to find fault with some part of a bill that does not suit him, it will always come that way because of the legislation stricken out. We are doing it right along. So with the current bill there has got to be some agreement between the language as it exists there and the very opposite, which, of course, is all in the way of legislation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me ask the Senator from Wyoming there——

Mr. LODGE. I should like to go on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I had the honor to serve on the Military Committee for six years. Has there been a single appropriation bill which came from the House of Representatives in the last six years that has not had some new legislation on it?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to answer——

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Not only is the Senator from North Carolina absolutely right, but we might send it back 16 years or for aught I know 60 years. Since I have been a Member of the Senate I think there has never been an Army appropriation bill that has not carried legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; but I have served on the committee, too, and I never saw that bill carry a statute before that no Senator has had an opportunity to consider.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will not deny that they carried legislation?

Mr. LODGE. Of course they carried legislation; we put legislation on here; but the fact remains that here is an entire statute on which the Senate never had a chance to offer an amendment or do a thing. Now, it comes back to us in an unamendable state and——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me to finish the sentence, whatever understanding or misunderstanding there may have been about the way in which it went into conference, nobody understood that there was to be new legislation put in in conference, and there is new legislation in this bill. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to ask the Senator to state at this point what is the effect of this new legislation as he views it?

Mr. LODGE. I was beginning to state it on one point when I was interrupted. The criticism which the Senator from Wyoming made as to the Chief of Staff related to the bill as it passed the House and as it came here. What I am going to point out is something that existed in no bill that was before either House, and that is putting a limitation on the person who can become Chief of Staff, I mean in due course of regular promotion. The limitation is put on that no man shall be capable of becoming Chief of Staff unless he has served 10 years as a commissioned officer of the line in grades below that of brigader general. Now, that is wholly new.

I want to call attention to the effect of legislation of that sort. Legislation of the kind that is in the bill would have rendered ineligible for service as Chief of Staff all but 4 of the 19 generals who have served as commander in chief of the American Army since Gen. Washington.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to finish the statement and then I will yield.

Mr. WARREN. All right, I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield; it is a matter of indifference to me.

Mr. WARREN. No; go ahead.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to put it in compactly and together. It would have disqualified Gen. Winfield Scott, of the old Army. It would have disqualified Gens. Sheridan, McClellan, McPherson, Meade, Warren, Halleck, Schofield, O. O. Howard, James H. Wilson, and Horace Porter, among others, of the Union officers in the Civil War, and Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Beauregard, Forrest, and Joe Wheeler, of the Confederacy. Gen. Grant would have barely escaped its restriction by one year's service and Gen. Sherman by two months.

Further, what it does to-day it makes it impossible for Gen. Wood ever to be Chief of Staff again; it makes it impossible for Gen. Funston ever to be Chief of Staff; it makes it impossible for Col. Goethals ever to be Chief of Staff. In fact, it disqualifies most of the Engineer Corps. It disqualifies Gen. Crozier, of the Ordnance Board.

Mr. DU PONT. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me for a moment, I will ask him if his remarks refer to Chief of Staff in time of peace, or does he apply them to generals of the Army in time of war?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. WARREN. It does not apply to time of war.

Mr. LODGE. I think you will find it there.

Mr. DU PONT. It does not.

Mr. LODGE. We will discuss that special point afterwards.

Mr. DU PONT. If the Senator will allow me, all those early generals, including Gen. Washington and Gen. Winfield Scott, were commanders in chief; they commanded armies.

Mr. LODGE. I know that. I said it repeatedly. This law would have disqualified them to be Chief of Staff.

Mr. DU PONT. I doubt if they aspired to the duties of Chief of Staff, who commands nothing.

Mr. LODGE. That may or may not be. I will not pretend to say. They might or might not have wanted it. I say it would have disqualified those men, just as it disqualifies Gen. Funston to-day from ever being Chief of Staff in time of peace. If the point is made on that, we will take that up later.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Those distinguished generals mentioned held their office as Gen. Funston holds his, and to-morrow, if the President saw fit to make Gen. Funston or Col. Goethals or any other officer of the Army commander in chief, this applies only to one particular place—the Chief of Staff. This particular officer is supposed to be the military adviser of the Secretary of War. He was supposed to be one who understood tactical situations and conditions and the movement of troops in the line of the Army.

Now, the Secretary of War wants an adviser. He has these staff officers around him in the building. He has only to step across the hall or to touch a bell and he calls in a chief of any one of these bureaus. But the Chief of Staff is supposed to be a man versed in the line of the Army, and he should by all means be always there. While this was no proposition on the part of the Senate, yet it was a proposition that I could not deny there was merit in. The Chief of Staff is simply the secretary of the Secretary of War, and to-morrow he or any other officer may be made commanding general of the Army in either war or peace.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say he could not be made a commanding general of the Army. I said he could not be made Chief of Staff, which to-day under the present organization is a most important office. I am not questioning about his being general of the Army, but this does exclude, as I said, men like Gen. Funston and men like Col. Goethals, who perhaps is more conspicuous in our Army to-day throughout the world than anyone else. It excludes Gen. Crozier, the distinguished member of the Ordnance Department. All those men would be excluded from being Chief of Staff.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To what extent does it exclude all the engineer officers?

Mr. ROOT. Practically all.

Mr. LODGE. Practically all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are they the first cadets?

Mr. LODGE. They are the honor men from West Point; they are men who graduated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are among the strongest officers.

Mr. LODGE. It is generally so considered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And they would be excluded?

Mr. LODGE. They would be excluded.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Massachusetts see any reason why men of that character would be especially fitted for this service?

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me, Mr. President, that there ought to be no exclusion laws about an office in our Army. I do not think it is our place to exclude men. I think there was something in Napoleon's old saying that every soldier in his Army carried a marshal's baton in his knapsack.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Col. Goethals is not to-day eligible to Chief of Staff; the shot at the engineers and at Col. Goethals is entirely wide of the mark. He can not under the present law be eligible.

Mr. ROOT. I ask why not?

Mr. LODGE. Why not?

Mr. ROOT. Why is not Col. Goethals eligible?

Mr. WARREN. Because he is not a general officer.

Mr. ROOT. Why can not he be made a general officer?

Mr. WARREN. But until that is done he can not be. Anybody can be made a general officer if there is a vacancy under the law, but Col. Goethals would have to first wait for a vacancy and then be promoted before he could become Chief of Staff.

Mr. LODGE. I am not proposing to make lieutenants Chief of Staff. I assume they have the necessary rank. I say this makes it impossible for Col. Goethals, if he was ten times a general here, to be Chief of Staff.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And if the Senator will allow me, I assume he will some day be first on the record.

Mr. LODGE. I hope for the sake of the country he will be.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. DU PONT. There is some misapprehension about these statements. There are only two who, under the law as it stands to-day, are eligible. Gen. Crozier and the Chief of Engineers are eligible to-day for appointment to the general staff. The Chief of Engineers or the Chief of Ordnance would be eligible under the present law. There is nothing to prevent the President from appointing Col. Goethals a brigadier general in the line, and as such he would be eligible.

Mr. LODGE. If he is appointed to a brigadier generalship in the line he is ineligible because of the fact that he has to serve 10 years in the line before he could be appointed under this bill.

Mr. DU PONT. I was going to add I doubt very much whether Col. Goethals would accept any position of that kind. He is a great engineer.

Mr. LODGE. I am not discussing what Goethals would or would not accept. I am taking the broad proposition that it is all wrong to pass legislation by which, when any man has risen by merit in the Army of the United States and attained to the necessary rank, he shall be excluded by an arbitrary provision of that sort from the opportunity to be Chief of Staff.

Mr. DU PONT. In time of peace.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me. I was simply illustrating by the colonel whose name was mentioned the want of wisdom in passing this piece of legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator inform us what the immediate reason is for this suggested change?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not pretend to enter upon motives.

Mr. POMERENE. I will, then, put it in this form: What is the peculiar situation which brings about this suggested change?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know what situation has arisen in the Army that makes it necessary to pass such legislation. I am not aware that there are any men there whom it is necessary to exclude by legislation of this kind, or who are unworthy men.

Mr. POMERENE. In what respect is it claimed that this would improve the reorganization of the Army?

Mr. LODGE. That I do not know.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to answer that question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I would be delighted to hear how it improves the Army.

Mr. WARREN. We have had for some years as the two ranking major generals of the Army men who came from the Medical Corps—able men, both of them, but without extended service in the line. We might have a few months hence another man from the Medical Corps, or we might have a Paymaster General selected as Chief of Staff. When it was submitted on the part of the House side and argued, it seemed to be that putting myself in the place, or putting any other man in the place, a civilian Secretary of War, who had to take up all these Army matters, would want to have as his adviser a man acquainted with the duties, performances, and responsibilities of the line of the Army, for it is the line of the Army that does the fighting.

There has sometimes been a tendency, Mr. President, to pretty much obliterate the line of the Army. In fact, the brigadier generals and the major generals appointed for some years back have been largely from officers who were here in Washington under the eye of the President, Secretary of War, and Chief of Staff, and I presume it will go on that way to the disadvantage of the men who are in the line of the Army who are away from Washington and consequently not under observation.

It did not seem to me to be an unreasonable restriction that hereafter in appointing new Chiefs of Staff they should have been of the line, so as to be able to give the Secretary of War the information of which he might be most in need. As I said before, the staff officers surround the Secretary of War—close at hand in the big building. It is an easy matter for him to get information from them, but take, for instance, the very able medical officer who now stands at the head of the Medical Department. If a new Chief of Staff was to be appointed, would it be, could it be, as good an appointment as it would be to take some able officer from the line? There are plenty of such line officers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Wyoming for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming why, if this precaution is deemed necessary in times of peace, it is to be discarded in the emergency times of war?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, war brings up new officers and new heroes, though they may come from the plow direct, the same as it has done in the past. There is no reason why in times of war the President should not be absolutely free as to all of his appointments. That has always been the case, and probably always will be the case.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me further?

Mr. LODGE. I will yield in one moment. I do not think that there is any probability or any danger that the Paymaster General or the head of the Medical Corps will be made Chief of Staff. The officers who have been made Chiefs of Staff who have formerly been doctors were both subsequently in the line, and one of them has served with great distinction as a volunteer soldier in the Army. The Senator referred to the volunteer. Of course he would be eligible, though he came from the plow. This provision excludes Gen. Funston, who was a distinguished volunteer officer of great gallantry in the War with Spain and also in the Philippines. He never served 10 years as a commissioned officer of the line under the rank of brigadier general.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. That is true; but that Senator and no other Senator can exceed me in admiration of Gen. Funston. Gen. Funston does not know the line of the Army, however, as do some other officers. Furthermore, this is not the last word, I beg the Senate to remember. Here is a situation before the conferees where we may lose five regiments of Cavalry, and, when gone, it will be difficult to reinstate them. We are met with a proposition that reduces the salaries of about 2,000 of the officers of the Army; we are met with various other cuts and various other things to arrange, and we are compelled not to take into view this one person or that one person; but there is a hereafter to all these matters, when they can be taken up and handled accordingly. I should be very glad to introduce and very glad to follow up a resolution, if Gen. Funston was desired as Chief of Staff by the President, to make an exception in his case; but it does not follow that the office of Chief of Staff ought to be filled continually from those officers who are here in Washington instead of being in the field. Exceptions could be handled for others, including Gen. Wood, but the general principle I believe a good one.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that shows the readiness to give it to Gen. Funston, and shows, I suppose, what is charged generally, that this provision is aimed at Gen. Wood. Why should he also not be excepted? He is a distinguished Volunteer officer.

Mr. WARREN. Right there I want to say a word. The Senator, I hope, will not venture into personal matters. Gen. Wood's time expires on the 4th or the 5th day of March. This provision will not take effect until after that. It is true, as the Senator says, if Gen. Wood was afterwards desired, his case could be handled singly, of course. This does not affect his present appointment.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, it does not, Mr. President. Of course, everybody realizes that, and I did not suggest that it did. I said it disqualified him forever from again being Chief of Staff. It also disqualifies Gen. Funston, as I pointed out, but it appears they are ready to except Gen. Funston. I do not think that is a good form of legislation.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, in view of all that has been said, I should like to make a statement at this point.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator desires to ask me a question I will yield for that purpose, but if he desires to make a speech I prefer that he shall make it in his own time.

Mr. DU PONT. I desire to make a statement in regard to this matter, if the Senator will yield to me for that purpose, and I shall be brief.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator if he wishes to make a statement.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, the amendment No. 73, in the form first proposed by the majority of the managers of the House, provided that except in time of war or when war is imminent, no officer, hereafter, should be detailed or permitted to serve as Chief of Staff unless he should have served for at least 10 years as a commissioned officer in the line of the Army below the grade of colonel.

The Senate conferees refused to accept this amendment on the ground that it was personal legislation and would compel the present incumbent to immediately vacate the office of Chief of Staff; but when the amendment was modified by the House managers making the above provision take effect on and after the 5th day of March, 1913, the point at issue was greatly changed. As the Army Regulations require the appointment of the present Chief of Staff to cease and determine on the 4th day of March, 1913, a provision which becomes operative on the 5th day of March has no bearing on his actual term of office. It is true that having been appointed Chief of Staff April 22, 1910, he would, on March 4, have served very nearly three years, and could be reappointed Chief of Staff by the new President and serve as such some 13 months before he would be compelled by law to return, for at least two years, to duty with troops; and it is also true that after having served with troops for two years he could be reappointed for four years; but all this is in the future, which is always nebulous and uncertain.

In this connection it is to be observed that the General Staff was organized upon the general theory and plan that officers of the different grades, including the chief, should succeed each other in turn, so that as many as possible might have practical experience in the administration of General Staff duties. Attention is also called to the following extract from the President's special message to Congress in regard to the legislation under consideration, dated December 21, 1911:

I am opposed to any plan the result of which would be to break up or interfere with the essential principles of the detail system in the Staff Corps established by the act of February 2, 1901, and I am opposed to any plan the result of which would be to give the officer selected as Chief of Staff, or to any other member of the General Staff Corps, greater permanency of office than he now has.

As in the judgment of the Senate conferees the possibility of future personal advantage to one or two officers ought to be subordinated to the interests of the Army as a whole, the next point to be determined was whether the legislation in question promoted such interests and was wise in itself.

After careful consideration, the Senate conferees concluded that it was good legislation, and agreed to accept it for the following reasons:

First. As the Chief of Staff is required by law to be the general military adviser of both the President and Secretary of War, who are frequently not well informed in regard to military matters, and as he is further required to exercise a general supervision over every bureau of the War Department, it is evident that he should be a man of experience and knowledge of military details; and, usually, such experience and knowledge can only be obtained by actual service with troops extending over a period of years.

Second. As there is no limitation in regard to those who are eligible for appointment as general officers of the line, the President could at any time, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a civilian who might be wholly ignorant of the military profession; and, further, if the President thinks proper, he could at once relieve the officer then serving as Chief of Staff and appoint the newcomer in his place. It is believed that such a possibility is fraught with danger, and that the effect of the legislation now under discussion would be to greatly improve the conditions now existing, inasmuch as the President, even if he did appoint an inexperienced person to be a general officer of the Regular Army, could not make him Chief of Staff.

The enactment of legislation is greatly to be deprecated when it is meant to strike at the appointment or official position at present held by any officer, but very much more to be deprecated is the rejection of legislation because it may affect, possibly but not certainly, the future interests of three or four officers, all of whom have already received special and most substantial promotion for services in the past, and this in face of the proposition that such legislation is good and sound in itself and intended to benefit the Army as a whole.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have listened to the explanation of the improvement to be obtained from this change, but it seems to me it makes the case rather worse than it was before. This is not legislation affecting now a few officers who are making this objection; it is legislation affecting a whole class of officers, now and in the future. There is no question of the Commander in Chief; it is an act of exclusion against certain officers and against certain classes of officers.

Mr. President, I have said as much on that branch of the subject as I care to say; but I should like to say a few words on another point of new legislation, which I do not mean to discuss, but merely to point out as new legislation. The House struck out the appropriation for a certain number of Army posts.

Mr. WARREN. No, Mr. President; the House did not strike out the appropriations for the Army posts.

Mr. LODGE. Well, it ordered that the appropriation should not be spent for a certain number of Army posts.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to be accurate. It seems to me to amount to much the same thing for our present purpose. They prevented the expenditure of certain appropriations for certain Army posts. On that the conferees have appointed a commission; and not only that, but they have selected the members of the commission, and, among others, they have selected three generals who have already reported on this subject.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to say that the commission appointed in 1901 did not report on this particular question, and what they said in reference to the subject was incidental. That commission was appointed for the purpose of selecting four general camps of instruction, and one or two of its members—for instance, Gen. Young—were members of the commission named in the present bill. In 1903, when the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] was Secretary of War, he referred to the War College the question of the proper distribution of appropriations for the different Army posts, and it so happened that Gen. Young was at that time a member of the War College. This body went into the subject at great length and considered the various posts and seacoast forts in the United States, but I hardly think the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts is exactly fair.

Mr. LODGE. They reported on the question of the abandonment of certain posts, unless I am mistaken.

Mr. DU PONT. But even if they have already reported on this matter, we would have men of greater experience and knowledge of the subject.

Mr. LODGE. They are all retired officers, and three of them have made a report in which the question of the concentration of Army posts was considered. I am not questioning the value of their report; but the point I wish to make is that I think it travels beyond the province of a conference committee, not only to propose a commission to which a certain question shall be submitted, but to select the members of that commission. That seems to me to be legislation which ought to come within the action of the two Houses. I am making no objection to the men selected; but it seems to me that it is something in which the Senate, without undue eagerness to take power, might have a voice.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me there?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The situation was this: The Chief of Staff had gone before the committee on the House side and recommended the abolition——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, allow me at that point to interrupt the Senator. If we are going to be accurate in our statements, let us be perfectly accurate. The House required from the War Department a report on the question of Army posts.

Mr. WARREN. Well, the Senator is jumping at conclusions. Before that time the Chief of Staff went before that committee and said they were going to propose the abandonment of a good number of the present posts and concentrate the troops in large posts at some uncertain points, and they were going to greatly reduce the expenses of the Army. He also stated that they were going to greatly reduce the number of clerkships and the expenses in that way of the Army, naming, I am informed, 30 per cent in the first place, and afterwards 35 per cent. Subsequently the House, by resolution, requested information as to the posts it was proposed to abandon. The Secretary of War hastened to reply. He gave a list of 25 posts, including some of the largest and newest in the country and covering half of the United States in area, and proposed to remove every post and every place where the United States flag floats over a representative of the Army from a tract of country nearly 2,000 miles one way by about 1,500 miles the other way, including a large number of States entire. The House, taking the Secretary of War at his word, inserted in three different places in the appropriation bill an inhibition against expending a dollar at any one of those posts, although they are occupied by troops and must be so occupied until other arrangements are made. The House also provided that there should be no new posts created and none enlarged without legislation by Congress. That is the situation we had to meet.

When the bill came to us in the Senate the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff came before our committee and explained that they did not mean that; they expected to abandon certain posts at some time, but they wanted us to strike out the provisions of the House bill in this respect. The House conferees demanded that there should be something put in place of these provisions, that they could go back to the House and report upon, because the Army itself, having asked through its chief officers for the abandonment of these posts, and the House having provided for such abandonment, the conferees wanted some reason to show why, after their following the advice of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff for abandonment of posts, they had to surrender to the Senate. So they proposed a commission, and named that commission without any suggestion on the part of the Senate. They named able officers of the Army who are retired, as they explained, because they were able officers of long experience who were unprejudiced. They leave it to the presiding officer of this body to select two members of the commission and to the presiding officer of the other body also to select two members of the commission.

That report may mean nothing; but whatever it may be when it is made, it will lie alongside of the other reports and will be of some use, probably, to the committees of Congress in future legislation. There can possibly be no harm in that.

The members of the proposed commission are all under pay now, so that it will not be a matter of any great expense. It may amount to nothing, but by putting that provision in the report it permitted to be satisfactorily adjusted the matter which we were asked by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff to eliminate from the bill, notwithstanding the fact that they themselves were responsible for its being there.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss the question of the merits of the various Army posts. I think there is something to be said for the view of the House and the view of the Army in favor of reducing the number of posts, but that is not what I was making my point on. My point was that it is entirely new legislation, and it now appears from the statement of the Senator from Wyoming that the Members of the House named this commission.

Mr. WARREN. It is not at all new legislation. Here is a proposition——

Mr. LODGE. I think it is new legislation to name the members of a commission.

Mr. WARREN. It has been done before, and will be done again, of course.

Mr. LODGE. It may have been done before where certain holders of certain offices were named.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. DU PONT. Four of the nine members of the proposed commission are to be appointed, two by the Speaker of the House and two by the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, I know that.

Mr. DU PONT. The other five were suggested to us by the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. LODGE. I did not suppose, Mr. President, that even so powerful a conference committee as this would select the Members of the House and Senate to serve on a commission, but I think it is new legislation for them to select officers of the Army.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and men have been named.

Mr. LODGE. Possibly; but if it has been done it is bad practice. If commissions are to be appointed and their appointment is not to be given to the President, I think the two Houses ought to have something to say about it.

Now, Mr. President, there are other points. Because of interruption I have taken more time than I had intended. One other point. This was not new legislation. It was legitimately before the conference. I brought it to the attention of the Senator from Wyoming when I found the bill was up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there not a report from the Secretary of War and also from the organized forces making suggestions to Congress with reference to the plan of concentrating the troops?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the opinion of the constituted authorities of the Army——

Mr. LODGE. That is the report the Senator from Wyoming referred to; at least I suppose so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not that more valuable and more useful than to have a report from retired officers who will not have anything to do under it?

Mr. WARREN. It might be considered more valuable if it was not for this very lamentable fact. Every Chief of Staff and every Secretary of War changes his base of action from that of his predecessor. We might to-day have a location of posts under the present Chief of Staff and the present Secretary of War, and probably it would be something else six months or a year from now, when there is a liability of there being changes in those offices.

For instance, a Chief of Staff who has completed his tour, the one who preceded the present one, an able officer, a brave and brilliant fighter of renown in the line, labored all one session, in fact, two sessions, to bring the Army up to a systematic standard of pay, readjusting the salaries of the officers and the pay of the men. We took the view the Senator from Georgia takes, that the Army ought to know what it wanted—the then Secretary of War and the then Chief of Staff—and we carried out as nearly as possible and almost perfectly their views. We made the pay of a soldier for his first term a certain amount; we added a certain amount for his second term; and a certain amount for his third term; for his marksmanship, and so on, along the line. The argument then made was that these men in the rank and file, in the line of the Army, noncommissioned officers and privates, might want to make the service a career the same as a commissioned officer does. We followed this plan, and when the present Chief of Staff had taken his place it was found that his views were directly opposite. He states that he does not want a man who has enlisted in the Army to reenlist, and suggests that we provide that no one shall be allowed to reenlist for a second term except the noncommissioned officers.

I realize that my friend the Senator from Massachusetts has been more than courteous to me, and I do not wish to go further in my interruption. So the committees of the Senate and the House, which have given years in that service, most of the members of which have had honorable service in the Army—in fact, in both armies—must depend somewhat upon their own judgment rather than depend entirely upon the changing views of those who happen to be Chief of Staff and Secretary of War at different dates.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, if we must rely upon our own judgment, why do we need a board of retired officers? But if we are to rely upon the judgment of some officers, would it not be better to take the line officers than to take the retired officers? The retired officers lived under this same old régime of scattered troops, and they would probably adhere to it. The present officers tell us, I understand, that the troops should be concentrated.

Mr. WARREN. A few do, acting, probably, under instructions from head centers; but as against them the files are full of the views of officers who are against it. A very small proportion adopt the present views. The view has prevailed for some time that some of these scattered posts should be abandoned and they have been abandoned, and still more will be abandoned and ought to be abandoned. In my State, out of 20 or more original Army posts all have been abandoned except 2 and the one in the Yellowstone Park. There is no objection to the abandoment of useless posts, but to take one-half of the United States, and with one fell swoop take the flag of the United States out of it entirely and leave the militia there with no troops with which to cooperate and with which to go into these great meetings, raises a question into which I think the Senators and Members of the House have a right to examine and upon which to express their views.

As to this commission of retired officers, what the views of the House may be I do not know. It may not effect anything, but I tell the Senator it certainly can not harm anybody. It can not legislate on the question of abandoning posts. They are simply asked as to their opinion on matters about which they can have no personal interest, because they have passed through the time of life when they may be influenced by their superior officers or outside influences.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suggested that I did not intend to discuss the merits of this bill, but I am perfectly certain it will not harm anybody.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Surely the Senator from Wyoming does not want to create a board on the ground that it will not harm anybody? What they do, I think, will be harmless, but it seems to me perfectly clear we had better follow the organized recommendations of those who are to serve in the future rather than these retired officers. So I am opposed to this legislation on its merits: I do not wish to see the board appointed; and I shall vote to recommit the report.

Mr. WARREN. That is the Senator's privilege. I wish I had the sanguine feeling the Senator has, but after you have sent a bill to conference, it is not a nice position for a conferee, who has labored two solid weeks in a conference and got the best he could after a lot of contentions, and who is in honor bound to protect that report, to have Senators rise in their magnificent presence——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Allow me to finish my remarks. I wish I had the sanguine feeling and the hopefulness, but the Senator from Georgia will some day be placed upon these conference committees and he will then know it is sometimes necessary to concede unimportant points in order to receive the benefits of very important ones.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been in the Senate almost as long as has the Senator from Wyoming, and I have served on conferences, not upon appropriation bills perhaps, but upon some hard-fought conferences, and I have seen a great many here from the Appropriations Committee, but I have never seen legislation that the Senate desired secured nor have I seen what was believed to be the best interest in any legislation secured by starting in on the proposition that we must yield to the other House. Our business is to do the best we can, and if there are things we must stand and stand for hard, let the House, which is to blame, take the responsibility of having the appropriation bills go over.

Mr. President, I had no expectation of occupying so much time, and I shall conclude. The point is entirely legitimate to the conferees, of course, but it, I think, will cause a great injustice to a number of very worthy officers. There is the consolidation of the Quartermaster's and the Commissary Departments; I dare say it is a very good thing. A year or two ago there was a large addition made to the Quartermaster's force, and quite properly, no doubt. There are three or four officers in the Commissary Department, who, when the consolidation takes place, under this bill will be put behind these officers in the Quartermaster's Department instead of being placed in the new, consolidated department in the regular line of promotion according to their present standing in the Army.

One of these officers, whom I happen to know, called my attention to it. This officer served in the War with Spain, was wounded in Cuba, served later in the Philippines, and has served faithfully and well ever since. He is now in the Commissary Department. If this consolidation takes place on its present terms he will have men put over his head for promotion—many numbers—who did not enter the Army until six or seven years ago.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. We introduced in conference the exact language of the Commissary General on the hearings covering the point the Senator is now speaking of.

Mr. LODGE. And the House did not accept it?

Mr. WARREN. And the House did accept it, and it is in the conference report now.

Mr. LODGE. The Commissary General, whom I asked for information in regard to it, tells me it has not been changed, and I can not find here what I want.

Mr. WARREN. We took the language precisely, word for word, of the hearing, just as it was given by the Commissary General, because we did not wish to do injustice.

Mr. LODGE. It does not correspond to the amendment which he sent me and which he says he asked for.

Mr. WARREN. That may be true; but it was stated in the hearing, and that is exactly what we added. I do not think the conferees ought to be lambasted——

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to get the general into trouble. The amendment he gives is totally different.

Mr. WARREN. We have every wish to cover the point for the general as well as we could.

Mr. LODGE. As a matter of fact, it was not covered. These officers are left in that way. They are now left so that they are deprived of the ordinary promotion which they would get if the corps were not consolidated. My proposition is that if the corps are to be consolidated, to which I make no objection, the officers who have a greater length of service should not arbitrarily be put back.

Mr. WARREN. There never has been a combination which has not seemed to do injustice to some officers.

Mr. LODGE. I know.

Mr. WARREN. And let me say that legislation has followed, when it was determined whom it would affect and how it would affect them, and it was legislation put in the appropriation bill two years ago that undertook to clean up the entire matter.

Mr. LODGE. I know about that. There is not any question that this can be done by a simple provision. There is not any question that it would not hurt anybody improperly. It is simply putting the men in those two departments—the Commissary and the Quartermaster's—upon exactly the same footing. It is an injustice to have a consolidation which takes men of one corps, who have seen no service in the field, over the heads of three or four officers who have seen service in the field, and depriving them of promotion for three or four years to come.

In the case of one officer, who would be promoted on the 5th day of next September, under this bill he will not be promoted until 1917. That bears hardly on a young officer, and I certainly hope that such a slight modification may be had. I believe if I had had an opportunity when the matter was before the Senate to lay these considerations before it, I could have got the Senate to make the necessary amendments, and it could have gone into conference. Now I can do nothing. I am helpless.

Mr. WARREN. The difficulty is that in different corps the promotion varies; in some faster than in others; and taking the Regular Army rules and law, there could be no other way than as we put it. Just as it was when we did away with the regimental organization and took up the lineal, it did injustice to a number of men, and still there seemed no way then that would not have done greater injustice. But, as I said, those matters have been fixed, and I hope this will be.

Mr. LODGE. It can be fixed only if it goes back to conference.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I do not think we shall have as successful a time in being able to fix it in conference as by taking it up alone.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senate has some rights, and I think if the Senate sees fit to send this back to conference it has a right to expect due consideration from the House, and I do not understand this tone that we must not send it back to conference because the House will not like it.

Mr. WARREN. Nobody is assuming that tone. The Senate has a perfect right to send it back to the House. It takes its chances. Are the feelings of one or two or three men to be of more concern than the maintenance of, say, the four or five regiments of Cavalry? We may be able, if it goes back, to accomplish everything the Senator wants, but I have never been able in conference to secure everything I wanted.

I want to call attention to the fact that Senators Hoar and Edmunds and Sherman lectured the Senate at different times, and I do not know but that the Senator from Massachusetts has done so, to the effect that the Senate must not carry too far its purpose in amending these money bills of the House, and, finally, if the House insists, the Senate must recede.

Mr. LODGE. That proposition came on adding new legislation. Neither Mr. Edmunds nor Mr. Hoar ever suggested that we could not amend a bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Please, one moment. I have been very patient in yielding. Let me finish one sentence.

This is a bill to reorganize the Army. Suppose it had come over here separately. Are we to be told we could not change one little clause in it; that we were exceeding the powers of the Senate to change one clause in an act of pure legislation? This is not an appropriation at all, and our power over the appropriation bills is unlimited with respect to amendment. The Constitution gives the House no power to originate appropriation bills. That is merely customary; a wise custom, I grant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How did the custom happen to arise?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Massachusetts must not——

Mr. LODGE. I am not going to argue the constitutional question with the Senator from Mississippi. It is not in the Constitution. We originate appropriation bills here every day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not general supply bills.

Mr. LODGE. No. I am not quarreling with the custom, and it is purely an academic question, but no one denies the right of the Senate as to amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I can not let the observation of the Senator from Massachusetts pass without correcting him. I made no such statement—that it does not apply to amounts as well as to legislation. The Senators I have quoted said while we have the right to amend but finally being unable to sustain, it was the duty of the Senate to recede.

Mr. LODGE. The distinction is that this is not an appropriation. This is legislation we are discussing here—pure legislation. If it had come over as a separate bill we could have put in every word after the enacting clause; we could have put in a new bill. I am not talking about adding new legislation. I am not talking about the powers of the Senate. I am talking about a very simple amendment to legislative provisions.

We have been constantly hearing of these Cavalry regiments. The Senate voted them in by an overwhelming majority, and I do not believe for a moment that either the House or the Senate would take the responsibility, in face of the situation in Mexico and in Cuba, of cutting down the regiments in that way.

I am not in the least afraid of our going to lose five regiments of Cavalry, because we stand for what we believe to be right and against objectionable legislation in a purely legislative part of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if he desires to go on with the appropriation bills?

Mr. WARREN. The matter at issue should be settled. I am ready that it should come to a vote now if others are.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I shall vote against the adoption of this conference report, and I hope that the Senate will send the bill back to conference. My view is based chiefly upon the provision regarding the Chief of Staff. I had hoped that we could have a stand here on these appropriation bills in clear-cut and definite assertion of our view as to the putting of controverted legislation on appropriation bills. I think it is a very bad practice. It is exercising a kind of compulsion out of which we are very apt to get bad legislation.

But if that is not to be the case, I want to say that I recognize the patient and painstaking service of the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate. I think, if we are to have any legislation, in many respects that the conferees have brought about very material improvements of the terms of the bill as it came from the House. I think, however, that this provision about the Chief of Staff stands on a different footing from the others. It seems so to me.

I was glad to have learned, both from the statement of the Senator from Wyoming and the statement read by the Senator from Delaware, and to have made a matter of record what I already knew, that the Senate conferees yielded to this when it was proposed in the conference and that they did not originate it. It is presented rather in the nature of a price which the Senate is called upon to pay for peace, for agreements upon all other things which were matters of difference in the bill. We have presented to us an agreement upon the matters which were in the bill, disposing of them in one way and another, I think a fair give and take. We must give as well as take in conference, as the Senator from Wyoming well says.

Upon the question as between leaving the old law of three years' enlistment and the House provision for a five years' enlistment they compromised on four years. That is a fair compromise. I prefer the three years of the present law, but you can not have everything to please you if you are going into conference.

Upon the question about the Army posts, the provision for a board is plainly a compromise. The whole subject is disposed of, shoved out of controversy, by means of the appointment of a board to pass upon it and report.

But it seems to me that as the price of a series of agreements the Senate is now called upon to consent to something which never was in difference, to consent to the sacrifice of the officer who is now at the head of the General Staff, and to consent to the adoption of a rule limiting the appointment as Chief of Staff, which I believe to be radically bad, and I do not think we should pay that price. That is not a part of the ordinary give and take and compromise of a conference.

Let me say, in the first place, about this provision that as I read it, it is not limited to time of peace at all; it applies to war as well as peace.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will explain upon what language he bases that contention. I may not know what the English language means, and of course I should like to defer to the superior legal knowledge of the Senator, but as I understand the English language it does refer directly to it. It starts in with the word "hereafter" and goes on to say "except in time of war or when war is imminent," and so forth.

Mr. ROOT. I do not think it is very material, but that is the way I read it.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator to remember that not only in the commencement, but he will find again down later on in the paragraph referring to the staff the same language is used, differentiating a time of war or threatened war and a time of peace.

Mr. ROOT. Here are the terms of the provision:

That hereafter, except in time of war or when war is imminent—

That is an exception to the "hereafter"—

no officer who shall have served 4 years as Chief of Staff shall be eligible for further service as Chief of Staff until after he shall have served for at least 2 years with the line of the Army, neither shall any officer, after the 5th day of March, 1913, be detailed nor be permitted to serve, as Chief of Staff unless he shall have served at least 10 years as a commissioned officer of the line.

There are two quite separate and distinct provisions, one of them taking effect immediately with an exception, the other taking effect the 5th day of March, 1913, with no exception. It seems to me quite plain that there is no exception applying to this provision.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. DU PONT. I will simply say that in the report as presented to us on the part of the House conferees it was understood by the conferees that it applied only to time of peace, and if the language is not very clear it is unfortunate. It was not intended to apply to time of war.

Mr. WARREN. I think if the Senator will read the whole amendment he will see that it applies to a time of peace.

Mr. ROOT. It is very long.

Mr. WARREN. I know it is long, and it is well guarded, I think.

Mr. ROOT. I do not find anything elsewhere in the amendment which it seems to me affects it.

Mr. WARREN. There is another clause which alludes again to a time of peace and a time of war.

Mr. ROOT. But not with reference to this appointment.

Mr. WARREN. It refers to the entire staff.

Mr. ROOT. Where is it?

Mr. WARREN. I have not the bill before me, but I remember it.

Mr. DU PONT. It is on page 67, before the word "provided." If the Senator from New York will permit me, I will read the language to which the Senator from Wyoming refers.

Mr. ROOT. That strengthens the view that I have taken. I knew it would. You perceive this exception to the time of war is not the language that I read applied to the provision prohibiting an officer who has served four years as Chief of Staff to be eligible for futher service until after he shall have served for at least two years in the line of the Army.

There is the exception of the time of war or when war is imminent. Here on the next page there is the same exception relating to the same subject:

And no officer who shall have served for four years under detail in any Staff Corps, or department, or the General Staff Corps, shall be eligible for further service therein until after he shall have served at least two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in time of war or when war is imminent.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, if I understand the English language, there is a paragraph which commences as the Senator has said—

That hereafter, except in time of war.

The Chief of Staff is a member of the staff. The Senator will admit that he is on the staff?

Mr. ROOT. Of course, he is.

Mr. WARREN. Now, we read along:

All officers of the line of the Army now detailed for service in any Staff Corps, or department, or in the General Staff Corps, shall be relieved from duty in said corps at the expiration of their present periods of detail, or sooner if the President shall so direct, and all officers hereafter detailed for service in the Staff Corps, departments, and General Staff Corps shall be relieved therefrom at the expiration of four years of such service, or sooner if the President shall so direct, and no officer who shall have served for four years under detail in any Staff Corps, or department, or the General Staff Corps shall be eligible for further service therein until after he shall have served at least two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in time of war or when war is imminent.

Mr. ROOT. Certainly; that is repeating, regarding all the officers of the same staff, the same rule regarding redetail and the same exception of time of war or imminence of war which is expressed regarding the Chief of Staff. When you come to the provision excluding any officer who has not served 10 years with troops, which is to take effect on the 5th of March, 1913, there is no such exception. But that is not a matter of such very great importance. The provision is a bad one and without just foundation. It is an injurious one when applied to time of peace, as well as when applied to time of war.

The Senator from Wyoming has spoken of the Chief of Staff as being a kind of military secretary to the Secretary of War. I must take leave to say that that involves an entire misconception of the function of the Chief of Staff. I do not think the Senator from Wyoming really meant that, because I am aware that he knows too well what the function is.

Mr. WARREN. I will say I get my ideas from reading the testimony in the hearings, the annual reports, and largely the reports of the Senator himself when he was Secretary of War.

Mr. ROOT. I will undertake to say that the Senator from Wyoming will not find a word in any report made by any Secretary of War prior to the 1st of February, 1904, which justifies any such view. The fact is that almost coincident with the creation of the General Staff there was a new arrangement made of bureaus in the War Department which consolidated the Office of Record and Pension and the office of The Adjutant General, and made that head of that office by name the Military Secretary. Subsequently the name of the Military Secretary established under that statute was changed back to Adjutant General, but it is The Adjutant General who is the Military Secretary of the Secretary of War. It is The Adjutant General who is to deal with the line of the Army. It is The Adjutant General who is to advise the Secretary of War upon all those matters of detail to which the Senator from Wyoming has referred.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator's permission to read into the RECORD exactly what he said on that point; then there will be no dispute.

Mr. ROOT. I should like to have an opportunity to see what the Senator is going to read in, because I may want to complete it by reading something else.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator probably remembers, as he was present when most of the discussions took place in the committee over the creation of this staff department, that, while I had some doubt——

Mr. ROOT. I remember the Senator was present and that he played a most important and useful part in bringing about that legislation.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator for that; but I think I ought to say, notwithstanding that compliment, that I had some very serious objections in the first place, and they were not entirely removed; but the earnestness with which the honorable Secretary and others advanced the cause finally decided me that it was certainly worthy of trial. I have been a consistent and constant supporter of the staff as far as I could be when they were performing the duties that fell to them by law. We have been besieged at both ends of the Capitol and by different Congresses to repeal the General Staff law. The Senator knows that there has been on the floor of the Senate on the part of older Senators a great deal of opposition to it. I have said that it is time enough to abandon it after we had tried it out thoroughly. I am not prepared to abandon it now; but if the Chief of Staff and Staff Corps are to be placed as a juggernaut, to run over everybody else; if the Chief of Staff and the Staff Corps are to be placed where the Army is delivered helpless and handcuffed into their hands; if it is to be a dark alley, where everything that goes down there in the way of propositions or letters come out and we finally find it never has passed more than one person, I shall feel as if we at least ought to try to amend the law.

Now, the Senator may think that the staff is performing exactly the duties that he and I and others intend it should. I think quite generally it has, but I think on other occasions it has not; it has assumed duties it never was intended it should perform.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, of course it has been necessary that the process of adjustment should be passed through in the very great change from the old method of managing the Army to the new method of managing it with a General Staff. I do not doubt that in the course of that process there have been officers who have seized upon power which belonged to some one else. I think that that has happened in entirely different directions. Undoubtedly it requires a certain process of adjustment before the machinery will find itself.

But that has little bearing upon the present question. I think the Senator from Wyoming will agree with the proposition which I now make, and which I think I have always consistently made, that the object of the General Staff is not that it shall be an administrative bureau. The very feeling which the Senator from Wyoming has exhibited in regard to things which have been done by the General Staff or some of its officers runs in that very direction. The General Staff is not to be an administrative bureau. The General Staff is to perform the function of doing the thinking and the studying and the collection of information and to advise upon all the greater and more important questions which are involved in the management and the development of the Army, and the building up of a military system upon our American plan, which involves a simple, highly perfected nucleus which we call the Regular Army, with preparation to insure the efficiency of a greater Volunteer Army to be called into existence when need comes.

It was because there was nobody to do the thinking for the Army except the men who were borne down and overwhelmed by the burden of administration that it was considered necessary that we should have a General Staff, whose business it should be not to attend to the little chicken feed of the movement of officers here and there and viséing of routine papers, but who should be charged with the duty of studying and collecting information, of making plans, of considering how the Army should be organized, how the general problems of administration should be worked out, and how it should be put into effective operation when occasion arises.

Mr. President, this proposed piece of legislation looks in directly the contrary way. It makes necessary as a qualification for the Chief of Staff the possession of those very qualities which are the least important for the Chief of Staff. Your Adjutant General should have served with troops; the men who have to do with the details of the Army should have served with troops; but when you have to select the Chief of Staff, the man who is to advise the Commander in Chief of the Army upon all the military questions, the man who is to direct the military education of the Army, the man who is to direct the thinking and the studying and the planning of the Army, and then the proper use of the enormous sums that we are voting from year to year against the time of need, it requires that brains should be sought for and the best and ablest man whom the President can find should be selected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think the brains of the Army rest with the Staff Corps and not with the line?

Mr. DU PONT rose.

Mr. ROOT. I think that the brains of the Army rest sometimes in the staff, sometimes in the line, sometimes in the men who have served 10 years with troops, and sometimes with men who have not. I think it is of the highest importance for the welfare of our country and the effectiveness of this military force, upon which we are spending so many millions, that the President of the United States shall not be fettered and confined in his choice by any arbitrary rule like this. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if, inasmuch as the law requires the Chief of Staff not only to perform the duties which he has so eloquently described, but also requires him to exercise general supervision over every bureau of the War Department, if the proper exercise of such supervision does not require the experience and the qualities which are determined by long professional service in the field?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think that the criterion which is set up in this proposed legislation is one of the very minor things necessary to enable the Chief of Staff to properly supervise the civil departments. The object of that supervision is to see that the civil departments do their part in the working of a great composite machine. What is necessary for the effective exercise of the supervision which is vested in the Chief of Staff is that we shall have a man of brains, a man of force, a big man and not a little man, who can see that the great machinery works smoothly and all the different parts are correlated and regulated so as to bring about an appropriate result.

Now, what does this provision do? In the first place, it puts a limit upon the President's right of choice, which will exclude from any possibility of ever being selected a half dozen of the best men in every class we have educated or are to educate at West Point. For more than a hundred years we have been educating young men to be officers of the Army. From 4 to 8 or 10 of the men who stand at the head of every class are put in the Engineering Corps, and we are now proposing to say by this legislation that the flower of the West Point education, that the first fruits of our military education shall be forever excluded from selection to the most important and responsible position in the American Army.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we have so far, with perfect liberty to appoint anyone, refrained from selecting an officer of that corps for Chief of Staff.

Mr. ROOT. Yes; for 10 years. We are to say that the man who has shown the greatest executive capacity of any American in our generation, Col. Goethals, who is bringing credit upon all Americans at Panama, shall be ineligible for that place.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I do not believe that Col. Goethals would consider that it was any inhibition. I do not believe he desires that kind of a special place. Col. Goethals is more liable to be nominated President of the United States than he is to want to be Chief of Staff, and I am not certain but that I am one of those who would like to see him in that place. Higher places than that of a Chief of Staff are awaiting him. Unless I mistake the feeling of the American people he can be made Commander in Chief of the Army to-morrow, or he can be put at the head of the Corps of Engineers, which, in my judgment, is a much higher place than that of Chief of Staff. There is no extra pay attached to the Chief of Staff. The Chief of Staff should have ability; he should be an all-round man; he should not be a teacher of grammar only, where grammar and geography and everything else are to be studied and taught. He may be the most important man in his profession, but to a citizen Secretary of War it seems to me there should be an all-round officer, not one who has spent his entire service in engineering, not one who has spent his entire service in medicine or in the Paymaster General's office. He ought to be a man who has had some service and who possesses some acute knowledge of the ways and byways of the Army in the field, the fighting force.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, this is not a question of Col. Goethals. It is of no consequence whether Col. Goethals would want to be Chief of Staff or not. The question is whether we ought to adopt a rule by which we would arbitrarily exclude such officers from the selection of the President.

Mr. DU PONT. Would the Senator consider that rule to apply in time of war also? I do not so consider it.

Mr. ROOT. I will give my reasons for thinking so; but whether it applies in time of war or not, Mr. President, the function of Chief of Staff is to so advise the President and the Secretary of War that we will be prepared for war.

Heaven forbid that we shall go back to a plan under which we are to have a lot of officers who are good enough for time of peace, and then, the moment we get into war, dispose of them and get a lot of others, who come in fresh, without having had any opportunity for preparation for the work which they have to do. We are trying as best we can to make preparations, so that when war comes we shall be reasonably ready.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator entertain the same idea that he expressed when the staff was formed and since, that it ought to be passed around; that there ought to be different generals serve for three or four years, and then go to the line; or does he believe that we ought to put one man at the head and keep him there, reappointing him after every two-year interval?

Mr. ROOT. No, Mr. President; I fully agree with the provision which prevents the redetail of anyone to be Chief of Staff until after he has gone back and had two years of service with the line. I fully agree to that. I do not want to have a man go there and stay there. I want to get as many men as possible trained in this kind of staff work, which tends to make men competent to command armies, but that is quite a different thing from limiting the President's choice so that you are likely to eliminate the biggest and ablest men in the Army from the possibility of selection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senator from New York wants to go on record that the biggest and ablest men in the Army are all in the staff.

Mr. ROOT. I certainly have never said anything to that effect.

Mr. WARREN. I was sure that the Senator would not, and I am sure he will say that it is a better policy if we can find capable generals enough to have many of them serve as Chief of Staff; and, by the way, all are excluded but generals. We want to keep that in view; there is no general proposition here. As the Senator has said, we can make officers brigadiers, but you can not make a brigadier general until there is an opening; you can not make a major general until there is a place for him. Therefore, if a colonel might be desired for the staff he could not be put on the staff now, nor could a lieutenant colonel. Col. Goethals accomplished his greatest feat while a major and lieutenant colonel. Officers below the grade of brigadier general have to wait, then, until there is a vacancy before they can become general officers. So the restrictions proposed were thought to be proper restrictions.

It seems to me—and I know the Senator agrees—that it is better, all things being equal, with sufficient material to mold into shape in the office of Chief of Staff, to train these men so that we may prepare them for war. Therefore, when a man has once served on the staff it is better for the Army that he should not serve again—unless in case of war, in which event it is open to all—so long as there are other men who can serve in the place to receive the benefit of the knowledge to be gained in that position, and also that the staff may receive fresh knowledge from the man who comes in from the outside.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, of course I did not mean to say that all the brains of the Army are in the staff, but I mean to say that a very considerable part of the men who presumptively are among the best in the Army would be excluded from the President's field of choice by this provision. I will say we ought not to make that exclusion without some good and sufficient cause.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask the Senator another question. It may be elementary. I was not satisfied with the staff law when it was passed as to one particular. When a general is appointed, or when any other officer is promoted or appointed, the nomination comes before the Senate for confirmation. The President can not promote a second lieutenant to be a first lieutenant until there is a vacancy, and he can not make a captain a major until there is a vacancy; it is restricted all the way up. It is restricted as to thousands of officers. It is idle to talk about unfairness in excluding half a dozen or three or four people from some certain position. They are all now excluded except general officers. The President of the United States could appoint one of the young men who stand at these doors, if he were of proper age, a brigadier general or a major general. That would come before the Senate, and if we should say "yes," he becomes such general officer. A man might be appointed who was fitted for certain duties, who it was expected would perform those particular duties, and he would be confirmed. On the very next day, as it is now, he could be made Chief of Staff. We should, in my judgment, have provided that when an officer is made Chief of Staff his nomination should come in here as such and receive the confirmation of the Senate.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not know that I should object to that, but that is not this question; that is not the subject that is here now.

Mr. WARREN. I allude to it because it is sought to leave the oue most important door wide open while we are closing every other one.

Mr. ROOT. The question here is whether we shall exclude from the President's field of selection in the Army for this important office this great number of men, among whom he is likely to find the man of force and character and brains who is most needed for the place. I have mentioned Col. Goethals as an illustration of that proposition. I could mention others, for example, of the very ablest minds and strongest characters in the American Army to-day, outside of the Engineer Corps, men who would be included in this restriction.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is alluding now to men who are fast passing away, who are permanent staff officers under the legislation which he so ably champions, and which I so obediently followed, lamblike, as I always do. We discontinued the permanent staff and provided instead details into these staff places and a return to the line; and hereafter when they go to the staff for a Chief of Staff they will have a man who has served in the line, as he should have served.

It has been stated in high places, and reiterated in the newspapers, in the interest of two or three individuals, that this is personal legislation. If you will study it a moment, it will be seen that it is general legislation in the sense that it does not apply to persons as such, except that it may tread on the toes of a few now whom we shall be glad to take care of hereafter; but, so far as the future is concerned, these staff officers are all to be officers who will come within the restrictions proposed, because all will have served in the line and most of them in the staff also.

Mr. ROOT. They might and they might not.

Mr. President, it is but a short time, and a very few years, since my friend the Senator from Wyoming was distinguished here as a shepherd. I am glad to find that he has changed his character and become a lamb.

Mr. WARREN. Well, that was said much to my credit, but it was a compliment that I did not deserve. I retreated, lamblike, and I stand here now being bastinadoed, if I may use that word, as usual, and as the poor lamb usually does.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am afraid that the lamb met a wolf in conference. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. It might be so. I only wish from the bottom of my heart that the Senator from New York had been one of the conferees in that long-drawn-out contest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You think you are meeting wolves now, do you not?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all, except in the distance. Of course it is an ungracious and uncomfortable thing for a man to have to serve, supposedly with the confidence of a body of which he is a member, in long-drawn-out contests, where he has the House from its corner with its gloves on and sponges ready, and with the heads of the War Department from another corner, when they had originally been seemingly partners with the House, having cooperated with it in what, in substance, came in the House bill, and then to be dissected on this floor, as we are, by men of eminent qualities of law. I am reminded when I think of the many doctors in the Army, and so forth, that doctors and lawyers seldom ever agree. I think the Senator from New York will find very few lawyers in this body, illustrious a lawyer as he is, who will agree with his proposition that this is applicable, as the language here reads, in time of peace and not in time of war.

Mr. ROOT. I have tried to express my very high appreciation of the great part of the work which the managers on the part of the Senate did in the conference, and I hope the Senator from Wyoming will believe in the sincerity of my remarks.

Mr. WARREN. I do entirely, although the situation is very much plainer to the man who has been under the hobnailed shoes of conference for two or three weeks than it is to the Senator who simply looks over the result. I think there ought to be some consideration given to that. Sometimes we are lucky to be alive and to get out of a scrap in that way. Now, if the Senate believes that I am in the habit of allowing the other House to bulldoze me in conference, I hope that they may never again put the responsibility on me of going into such conferences, but I believe I have not that reputation, or I certainly do not have it upon the House side, whatever may be thought here.

Mr. ROOT. Well, Mr. President, I think that this piece of legislation is a price that we ought not to pay, and I put to the Senate the proposition that the history of the United States shows that the criterion which it is proposed to accept as a limit upon the President's right of selection is not a wise and a sound one, for it would have excluded Gen. George B. McClellan both on the score of service and——

Mr. WARREN. We had no such office then.

Mr. ROOT. I know; but if there had been he would have been excluded.

Mr. WARREN. The officers of that day are dead and gone. They held the offices to which they were eligible.

Mr. ROOT. Who would say that Gen. McClellan would not have made a good Chief of Staff? This restriction would have excluded Gen. Robert E. Lee. Will anyone say he would not have made a good Chief of Staff? It would have excluded Gen. Sheridan; it would have excluded Gen. Meade; it would have excluded Stonewall Jackson; it would have excluded Gen. Schofield, and a dozen others.

Mr. WARREN. All of whom had valiant service in wars and were eminently fitted therefor, and all of whom had the honors that came to them, and which, we hope, will come to officers in the future. There is no occasion to speak of them in connection with the present office of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I think the statement about Gen. Schofield is erroneous. He was an Artillery officer, to my certain knowledge, for a great many years. I do not see how he could possibly have been excluded.

Mr. ROOT. I am so advised.

Mr. DU PONT. I have also been advised that this would not have excluded Gen. Sheridan.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor Gen. Lee.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has been misadvised; that is all. I did not care to take up that point, but it is true, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. DU PONT] has stated, that there are several who are included in that list who would not have been excluded. Such statements make good newspaper reading, but they are not true.

Mr. ROOT. That may be. I asked for a memorandum as to the officers who did not comply with this criterion, and I read from the list which was furnished me from the War Department; and I read these names for the purpose of showing that the criterion proposed is not a just criterion, and that that limitation ought not to be put upon the President's selection, because the very men whom everyone will say would have been admirable chiefs of staff do not comply with it. It is imposing, instead of the criterion of brains, and character, and ability, the criterion of detailed service, which would be excellent as applied to the men who have to do with details, but of comparatively little use when applied to the men who have to deal with larger things.

Mr. President, that is the substance of what I have to say, except this: Why is this criterion proposed? The Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Delaware have made a loyal fight for the conference report, including this provision which they did not propose, but to which they have yielded. Why is it proposed, when all of us now know, Mr. President, that it arose from personal considerations, and that you might as well adopt a provision saying that after the 5th day of March no man whose initials are L. W. should ever be detailed as Chief of Staff?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator may have information which I do not have, but I think the conferees on both sides will bear me out in the statement that not a disrespectful word was said in any of the meetings of the conferees, nor was there anything said there which could have given offense to the officer whose initials the Senator has stated. There was no feeling shown, to my knowledge, on the part of the conferees, but, on the contrary, the records of this Senate will show where my friendships have been and where my efforts have been in upholding the officer referred to on many occasions, and on at least two occasions when severe contention followed proposed promotion. There was, as I have stated, not a disrespectful word; there was no reference whatever to the differences that may have occurred heretofore, and they were not considered and had no place in conference.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, the Senator from New York and the Senator from Massachusetts seem to have objections to legislation on an appropriation bill. That does not appeal to me if it is good legislation and has been considered by the Senate; but the provision that has been adopted here was never considered either by the Senate or by its Committee on Military Affairs, and was never discussed by either. The question now comes up, and without any consideration whatever as to its details by the Senate or the committee it is proposed now to act upon it. If it were a good provision, I should not object, but I do not think it a good one. I prefer the House provision to that of the conferees, I think the House provision is very much better than the one agreed to by the conferees. That provision adopted the old law in this respect entirely, and made no change; it prescribed no qualifications for the Chief of Staff that had not heretofore prevailed; and it required no number of years' service in the line below the rank of colonel, as does this report.

I do not think, Mr. President, such a radical departure from the old law should be made by the conferees without taking the sense either of the Committee on Military Affairs or of the Senate. I object to it because it seems to be personal legislation. There are only two or three officers who would now be eligible for appointment who are eliminated from possible appointment forever. If we are to surrender the many provisions that have been surrendered by the committee in conference for the single purpose of saving the Cavalry, I think we have surrendered more than we got; it seems to me that the Senate saved the Cavalry and the House rode off on the horses.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator ought to know that it is not true that a trade of that kind was made.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I say the Senate saved the Cavalry and the House rode off on the horses.

Mr. WARREN. I am alluding to the Senator's expression just before that, that we had traded for the Cavalry about everything else.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I did not say "trade" at all.

Mr. WARREN. Then, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I said we surrendered more valuable things than we received.

Mr. WARREN. That is a matter of opinion; but the Senate, of course, will express its opinion as to that.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes; and I am expressing my opinion now. I object to this conference report in regard to the supply department, because it does a great injustice to many good officers who have served long and faithfully, who ought to be considered. I think preferences have been given that should not have been given. I believe, Mr. President, that the Senate has a right to consider all these matters that have been agreed to in conference, and, if it does not approve of them, it ought to send the bill back to conference.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I take no issue with him about whether the Senate sends it back or not; but it so happens that as to the amalgamation of certain departments of the Army, and the relation of those offices one with another, we succumbed to the entreaties of the department and put them in the way proposed, rather than to undertake to equalize them in any other way. That was done not only according to the law but according to the expressions that we received from the department.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes; but I think the conferees overlooked many matters in that connection in the haste of the conference. I have no doubt the Senator would have been glad to have provided that no injustice be done anywhere; but legislation can not be had in conference as it can in the open Senate, and what I object to is that this legislation has never been considered by the Senate and never considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, who had charge of the bill. I shall therefore vote to send the bill back to conference.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I simply want to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming. So far the conference report has been discussed apparently from the standpoint of one officer. I will ask the Senator what this bill does in the way of reducing the Army expenses to the people of the United States below the bill of last year?

Mr. WARREN. As I remember, this bill is something like two or three million dollars, and perhaps $4,000,000, less than the bill of last year.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House has said in his report to the House that this bill reduces expenditures about $10,000,000. That is his estimate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, speaking of the reduction of expenses, the Senator from Wyoming offered as one of the reasons why the provision that has been under discussion was accepted, that it was necessary in order to save a decrease in the number of salaries. If it is a question of increasing or decreasing salaries, that ought to be settled on its merits. If the salaries ought to be decreased, they ought to be decreased; if they should not be decreased, then they should not be decreased; but we should not incorporate into a conference report legislation that was neither in the bill as it passed the House nor in the bill as it passed the Senate in order to save either an increase or a decrease of salaries.

The Senator also said that it was necessary to accept this report in order to save the five regiments of Cavalry. Well, as to whether or not the five regiments should be saved or lost is a question that ought to be decided on its own merits.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator puts it rather pointedly. I will say that, in order to compose the differences, there had to be a general understanding all along the line, each matter being taken up tentatively, and nothing of importance could be settled until all were settled. That is all I intended to imply, but I do say that, in my judgment, the essential points valuable to the service were retained a great deal more largely by the Senate than by the House. That is my opinion.

Mr. BRISTOW. I simply rose to say that all the disputed questions which the Senator says have been yielded ought to have been settled upon the merits of each particular question. To bring into the bill a legislative provision which neither the Senate nor the committee had any opportunity to consider and then require us to take it or not, without any opportunity for amendment, it seems to me is unfair and unjust.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, undoubtedly the Senator from Kansas is right when he says that the question of salaries is a question to be considered upon its merits; that the question of the consolidation of the quartermaster service and the commissary service is a question to be considered upon its merits; and that the question of the five regiments of Cavalry is a question to be considered upon its merits; but, undoubtedly, the Senator is absolutely wrong in his omissions or pretermissions. It is true that these questions are to be considered upon their merits; but by whom? Not by the Senate alone. The House is an equal and coordinate body with us; they have a right to consider these questions upon their merits, and they did so consider them, or, at least, it is our duty to assume that they did. They sent a bill here. A conference is held and the contending parties meet, each having considered each question upon its merits and each having come to a conclusion, each conclusion being worthy of equal consideration.

Mr. President, it would make the gods themselves upon Olympus roar with laughter to hear the Senator from Massachusetts this morning when he dramatically and rhetorically exclaimed, "The Senate of the United States has some rights!" For a man who has served here for years in either of these two bodies it is a well-known and a notorious fact that, as a rule, the House in conference surrenders. Thomas Jefferson long ago predicted that that would be the case, because, he said, the Senators, with their longer tenure of office, most of them living in the city of Washington in their own houses, would never be impatient about going home, while Members of the House, living elsewhere, would be impatient about going home, and that in an extended struggle between the two Houses the Senate would generally prevail.

This country never has been injured thus far by the House prevailing in conference, because it has seldom prevailed. It has been injured in a very great many cases by the fact that the Members of the House, anxious to go home, would give up principles well worthy contention in order that they might go home, especially in years when a campaign was on hand; and, of course, they have to run every other year.

Whatever may be the merits of this particular clause of the conference report, taking it all in all, I confess that I have some doubt about it. I have at least this extent of doubt about it: If I thought this clause of the conference report—section 5—was a blow aimed at Gen. Leonard Wood—and there is no reason why his name should not be mentioned, if gentlemen have it in their minds—I for one would not strike the blow. I think the man is pretty nearly a genius. I think he is a man with an immense lot of brain, and that he is very well fitted for just exactly the sort of work he is doing right now.

Moreover, if I thought this clause would hamper or fetter the President in time of war, when a man always wants to prove his worthiness for action upon the battle field or in a campaign, I should not vote for it at all. I do not think it will do so, however; and I will tell you why in a moment.

But before I say that I want to say this, Mr. President: I never heard of but one war or campaign being won by a staff; and it happened in that case that the chief of staff was also the general in command of the army. That was when Von Moltke invaded France.

Take our late War between the States. The generals on both sides would have been infinitely better off in a great many cases if their staffs at Washington and Richmond had let them alone. The most ridiculous thing in the history of the world was the old Aulic Council of the Austrian Empire, sitting down in Vienna, drawing plans, and expecting Napoleon Bonaparte to pay some attention to them, which he did not do.

I am thoroughly of the opinion that a segregated staff is a misfortune. I am thoroughly of the opinion that the men who serve upon the staff and the men who serve in the line ought to be going backward and forward all the time; and that every man in the Army, of the requisite rank, ought to have an opportunity to master the staff function and an equal opportunity to master the line function.

In time of war all rules and regulations are abrogated. If, in time of war, a man made himself known, as Stonewall Jackson did in the valley campaign, or as Napoleon Bonaparte did in his first Italian campaign, or as Bedford Forrest did—a man who had never had a day's training in soldiery—a wise Executive would advance him and promote him. The life of an army in time of war is the principle Napoleon laid down when he said he wanted each private soldier to believe he carried a marshal's baton in his knapsack.

But that does not hold good at all in time of peace. You can not go around guessing at who has military genius. There is no opportunity in time of peace to show whether a man has or has not military genius. Napoleon Bonaparte would have been a very bad soldier in a peace establishment—crabbed, irritable, impatient, insubordinate. Many another great soldier would have been exactly in the same shoes.

Coming now to the question whether this language applies to war or not; the Senator from New York has said it does. I very much dislike to differ from one of such clear and lucid powers of expression, and who, therefore, is to be presumed to be equally capable of deciphering another man's expressions. But there is no doubt about the meaning of this language. Let us see what it is:

That hereafter, except in time of war or when war is imminent, no officer who, etc.

What have you in what I have read? You have, first, the condition of time. You have, second, the condition of exception. You have, third, the subject of the sentence. That subject continues to be the subject of the sentence until the sentence concludes.

Now, let us go along a little bit further:

Hereafter, except in time of war or when war is imminent, no officer who shall have served four years as Chief of Staff shall be eligible—

And so on, until you get to the comma.

Neither shall any officer—

You have there the words "no" and "neither." The "neither" refers back to the "no," of course; and both of them refer to the condition of time, the condition of exception, and the subject of the sentence.

If this had read, "neither shall he, after the 5th of March, 1913, be," and so forth, nobody would have raised the point. But the conferees have repeated the subject in words, "no officer," "neither shall any officer." If they had happened to say "neither shall he," there would not have been any doubt at all in the mind of the Senator from New York.

There is not the slightest doubt about the fact that this language does not apply to a time when war is either on or imminent. Therefore it would not prevent the President of the United States from recognizing the capacity and genius of some man who, in the throes of war, had shown himself fit to contend with circumstances and who, in the very tumult of war, had shown himself fit to face it with a master's eye, a master's foresight, and a master's hand.

Military genius is a very peculiar thing. In few wars have accomplished engineers made great generals. Perhaps the greatest engineer upon the Confederate side in the war between the States was P. G. T. Beauregard, who never was a success in the field. Gen. Lee was an exception—a great engineer and a great general in the field as well. Grant did not belong to the Engineer Corps; Phil Sheridan did not.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that Gen. Lee served for five years in the line.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it. Gen. Lee served for 10 or 12 years in the line altogether.

Mr. DU PONT. My point was that his service was not exclusively as an engineer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say he was one of the few men who was great in both capacities. The engineering work that he did at Charleston, right at the beginning of the war, was so absolutely complete that although Charleston was one of the places eagerly sought by the Federal Army for political as well as for strategical purposes it was one of the last to give way. Yet in the field Gen. Lee was the equal of almost anybody as a strategist and a tactician.

Napoleon Bonaparte was a very good engineer and a very great general. Stonewall Jackson was not a great engineer; Grant was not; Sheridan was not; and while I do not remember about Sherman, I do not think he was. I do not think he ever went into the Engineer Corps.

Mr. DU PONT. He was an Artillery officer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He was in the Artillery, and did not graduate at West Point into the Engineer Corps, did he?

Mr. DU PONT. No; he did not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought not.

The point I am trying to make is that a peace establishment and a war establishment necessarily must be different. They ought not to be different if you could find out the men in time of peace; but you can not. They have had no opportunity to prove themselves.

The Senator from New York says he would hate to have things in such a condition that when a war came we would have to displace incompetent men in the staff and replace them with competent men. So would I. But it is one of the chances you must take, because you have no way of absolutely finding out what men are competent upon the field of battle except when you give them the field of battle, nor what men are competent as tacticians and strategists in a campaign unless you face them with a campaign.

As I said a moment ago, Von Moltke was the only great chief of staff I ever heard of who at the same time was a general in command of an army. His was the only campaign in history that I recall now that was ever won by a staff officer's plan. In that case he was great in both capacities, and that was probably the reason of his success.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Mississippi has referred to the remarks I made in regard to the settlement of the question of salaries upon its merits, and the settlement of the question of the five regiments of Cavalry upon its merits.

I did not desire to convey the idea that the House has not its rights, just as the Senate has. Of course that is recognized. But when there is a difference between the House and the Senate as to the size of the Cavalry branch of the service, as to the number of regiments of Cavalry the Army ought to have, the question is one for the House and the Senate to decide. Certainly it is not justifiable to yield a point as to the Cavalry we need in order to secure some other provision as to who shall be eligible to the office of Chief of Staff. And the same may be true of the salaries to be paid.

I am in hearty accord with what the Senator said in discussing the promotion that officers receive in time of war for gallantry and meritorious service. But here is a provision in the bill that would prevent the President from appointing to the highest and most responsible office in the Army, that of Chief of Staff, a man who, by meritorious service in the line in time of war, has rendered valuable service to the country. Why should Congress incorporate in this bill a provision that would make it impossible for the President to appoint Gen. Funston Chief of Staff if, in his judgment, it should be desirable to do so?

The Senator from Wyoming says he is perfectly willing to make an exception in behalf of Gen. Funston. I think that is a recognition of the merits of a very worthy and efficient man. But this is general legislation; and in the future other men will distinguish themselves as Gen. Funston has. We ought not to have a provision in the bill that will render them ineligible to high promotion in time of peace. The fact that a man renders conspicuous service in time of war is a reason, of course, why he should be promoted in time of war, but that does not justify us in passing a law that will prevent a proper recognition of that man in time of peace.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to say a word in opposition to the conference report.

As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I had some little interest in the makeup of the bill. If I had followed my own disposition it would have been to sustain some, possibly all, of the legislation proposed by the House of Representatives. It was decided in committee, and it was decided on the floor of the Senate, that we would take a position against legislating in this appropriation bill, and practically speaking, the legislation was cut out upon that understanding.

The bill went into conference, and it now comes back to the Senate. Instead of containing legislation proposed by the House of Representatives, discussed in public, weighed in public, and voted on in public, it now contains legislation agreed upon by the conferees, who certainly ought to have no power to present such new legislation to the Senate in the absence of any opportunity to consider it, in the absence of any opportunity to amend it, and without any information as to how the Senate stands upon that legislation.

I agree with what has been said against the proposition contained in the conference report, which practically can be construed as nothing more nor less than an attack upon Gen. Wood. I have no particularly strong partisan feeling for Gen. Wood; but I think it is a misuse of legislation, particularly of legislation by a conference committee, to single out an officer of the Army and disqualify him from further continuance in his office or for reappointment to his office.

But that is not all that I find fault with in the conference committee report. The conference committee not only usurps the functions of the House and the Senate in creating new legislation, but it assumes executive functions. It names and appoints a board of retired officers to constitute, with two Senators and two Members of the House of Representatives, a commission to take into consideration the military posts of the United States.

If it had been found proper by the conference committee to make that radical change in the House and Senate bill by the creation of a commission, it at least might have left the selection of the members of the commission to the War Department or to the President. But the conference committee has specifically named the officers of the Army who shall constitute that commission.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will yield——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me suggest, also, that it might have been left to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House to name the persons who shall represent the Senate and the House. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Nebraska that the report simply incorporates in the bill the names of the officers that the conferees want appointed on the commission.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly the conference committee went outside of its proper functions when it undertook to select the officers of the Army who shall constitute this commission.

The same conferees provide that there shall be selected two Senators from the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate and two Representatives from the Military Affairs Committee of the House to act with the military officers. I am rather surprised that they did not also name the Senators. They are certainly more qualified to judge as to the fitness of Senators to sit upon the commission than they are to judge of the fitness of military officers to represent the War Department upon the commission.

So, Mr. President, I object to this conference report, in the first place, because the Military Affairs Committee took such action as to indicate that it was against legislation; and I, for one, if I were up against the necessity of accepting legislation, would much prefer to accept the legislation proposed by the House of Representatives rather than the legislation proposed by the conference committee.

I want to say to the Senator from Texas, who raised the point here a few moments ago, that the conference report does work some economy in the expenditures of the War Department, to the extent, I think, of some $2,000,000. Yet the fact is that the House bill, if it had been accepted in the form in which it came to the Senate, would have saved some $10,000,000. So, if there is any argument of economy, in my opinion, the House bill, with its legislation, would have been infinitely preferable to the bill which has come from the committee of conference.

I also agree with what the Senator from Alabama says, that in the midst of this legislation, which is evidently designed to strike down some officers and promote other officers, an attempt apparently has been made to discriminate against the departments to be consolidated into the supply department; and the strange anomaly in legislation is proposed that the first head of the Supply Department shall be a major general, whereas upon his retirement only a brigadier general shall be named to succeed him. Upon its face, in the absence of any explanation, that looks like an attempt to legislate in favor of one particular officer of the Army. I do not know that it is. I do not charge that it is.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would be consistent with himself. A moment ago he accused the committee of naming men. He now accuses it of naming men when they are not named.

I have no more idea than has the Senator whom the President may appoint as chief of this department. The House bill, as it came to us, provided that the office should be held by a major general continually. We believed that the first man, whoever he may be—and we had confidence that the President will select a man who has had experience in some of those staffs—deserves better than those that may follow him, in that he will have the first organization of the great bulk of the work, and will have to exercise the great skill that will be necessary to amalgamate those departments.

We of the Senate demanded that this officer should be a brigadier general only. But as between a brigadier general only, for all time, and the House proposition to have a major general for all time, the Senator will see that we did not transcend any bounds of proper conference when we compromised and said it should be a major general during the period of construction and afterwards a brigadier general.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope when the matter again goes to conference the Senator from Wyoming, on behalf of the Senate, will insist that the office shall be held by a brigadier general. If that insistence is made effective I believe it will be a sufficient answer to the rumors, which have been universal, that the major generalship is intended for a particular individual who is favored by certain parties in important position. I have not charged that the Senator from Wyoming nor any member of the Senate committee——

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I have been a constant reader of the newspapers, and I have knocked about quite a good deal among Senators and others, but the Senator is alluding to what I have never heard alluded to by anybody else—that some particular man is selected for that position. I do not believe that to be accurate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it will be sufficient assurance that that will not occur if the opportunity for promotion is not offered—if the head of the department is required to be a brigadier general at first as well as at any subsequent time.

Mr. WARREN. In fact, I do not know now to whom the Senator is alluding. I have not the faintest idea.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not propose to tell the Senator, although it is a matter which has been talked of so generally, that I am very much surprised that it has not reached his ears; but, in any event, there is no reason that the Senator from Wyoming can advance—and I understand from the position he takes that he does not believe there is any defense for it—why the first head of that new department should be a major general, except for the purpose of giving a promotion to a certain individual.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARREN (when the name of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming was called). My colleague [Mr. CLARK] is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I understand that both those Senators would, if present, vote for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I will withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when Mr. LEA's name was called). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is unavoidably absent owing to affliction in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. POMERENE (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SAUNDERS] and withhold my vote.

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] informs me that the junior Senator from Utah would vote "nay" if present. So I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea." I understand that he is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who would also vote "yea" if present.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I should vote. I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired on this vote with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], and I desire to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURNHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I wish to inquire if he has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. BURNHAM. Then I withhold my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] and withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent from the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bourne	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Catron	Foster	Myers	Swanson
Chamberlain	Gronna	Oliver	Tillman
Crawford	Lorimer	Overman	Warren
Culberson	McCumber	Page	Wetmore
Cullom	McLean	Perkins	Williams
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shively

NAYS—24.

Ashurst	Chilton	Jones	Root
Bacon	Cummins	Lodge	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Gore	Percy	Smoot
Bristow	Hitchcock	Poindexter	Stephenson
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Rayner	Thornton
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Reed	Works

NOT VOTING—43.

Bailey	Curtis	Kern	Richardson
Bankhead	Davis	La Follette	Sanders
Borah	Dixon	Lea	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	du Pont	Lippitt	Smith, Md.
Briggs	Fall	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Brown	Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Burnham	Gamble	O'Gorman	Stone
Clapp	Gardner	Owen	Sutherland
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Paynter	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Heyburn	Penrose	Watson
Crane	Kenyon	Pomerene

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. DU PONT. I understand that I am not recorded on the vote just taken. I desire to inquire if that is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware is not recorded.

Mr. DU PONT. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can not now be done.

Mr. DU PONT. I will say that if my name had been called I would have voted in the affirmative.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's name was called.

Mr. DU PONT. I was present in the Chamber. Then I could not have heard it.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LAS CRUCES, N. MEX.

Mr. WARREN. Before I ask the Senate to proceed with the legislative appropriation bill I yield to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], who has a bill he wishes to call up.

Mr. CATRON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 6745) to provide for the erection of a Federal building in Las Cruces, N. Mex.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "ten," and in line 10, after the word "dollars," to strike out the remainder of the bill in the following words, "and there is hereby appropriated the amount of one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars for such construction," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States post office, United States court and land office, and other Government offices in Las Cruces, Dona Ana County, N. Mex., upon the site heretofore authorized, at a total cost of not more than $110,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that House bill 24023 be now proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will begin the reading at the point where it was discontinued.

The reading of the bill was resumed at page 124, line 14.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of Justice," on page 124, line 17, before the words "Assistant Attorneys General," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; in line 21, before the word "attorneys," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 22, after the word "arising," to strike out "therefrom" and insert "from such condemnation proceedings"; on page 125, line 4, after the word "attorneys," to insert "one at $4,000"; in line 5, after the word "each," to strike out "one at $2,500" and insert "two, at $2,500 each"; in line 13, after the word "law clerks," to insert "one at $2,500"; in line 18, before the words "disbursing clerk," to insert "assistant superintendent of prisons, $2,000"; in line 19, after the words "Chief of," to strike out "division" and insert "Bureau"; in line 21, after the sum "$1,800," to insert "clerk to also act as disbursing clerk during absence of the disbursing clerk, $2,000; clerk in charge, Division of Mail and Files, $2,000; clerk in charge, Division of Supplies, $2,000"; on page 126, line 1, before the words "of class 4," to strike out "eight" and insert "four"; in the same line, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "six," and insert "seven"; in line 2, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "sixteen"; in the same line, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fifteen"; in line 3, before the words "at $900 each," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-two"; in the same line, after the word "each," to insert "clerk in charge stenographic division, $1,600"; in line 5, before the word "messengers," to strike out "five" and insert "seven"; and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$407,610" and insert "$437,090," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Attorney General: Attorney General, $12,000; Solicitor General, $10,000; assistant to the Attorney General, $7,000; 7 Assistant Attorneys General, at $5,000 each; Assistant Attorney General of the Post Office Department, $5,000; Solicitor of Internal Revenue, $5,000; Solicitor for the Department of State, $5,000; 4 attorneys, at $5,000 each, one of whom shall have charge of all condemnation proceedings in the District of Columbia and supervise the examination of titles and matters arising from such condemnation proceedings in which the United States shall be a party or have an interest, and no special attorney or counsel, or services of persons other than of those provided for herein, shall be employed for such purposes; attorneys—1 at $4,000, 1 at $3,750, 3 at $3,500 each, 1 at $3,250, 12 at $3,000 each, 2 at $2,500 each; assistant attorneys—1 at $3,500, 2 at $3,000 each, 2 at $2,750 each, 5 at $2,500 each, 1 at $2,400, 2 at $2,000 each; assistant examiner of titles, $2,000; chief clerk and ex officio superintendent of the buildings, $3,000; superintendent of buildings, $500; private secretary and assistant to the Attorney General, $2,000; clerk to the Attorney General, $1,600; stenographer to the Solicitor General, $1,600; law clerks—1 at $2,500, 3 at $2,000 each, 2 of class 4, clerk in office of the Solicitor of Internal Revenue, $1,800; attorney in charge of pardons, $3,000; superintendent of prisons, $4,000; assistant superintendent of prisons, $2,000; disbursing clerk, $2,750; appointment clerk, $2,000; Chief of Bureau of Investigation, $3,500; examiners—3 at $2,500 each, 4 at $2,250 each, 2 at $2,000 each, 3 at $1,800 each; librarian, $1,800; clerk, to also act as disbursing clerk during the absence of the disbursing clerk, $2,000; clerk in charge, Division of Mail and Files, $2,000; clerk in charge, Division of Supplies, $2,000; clerks—4 of class 4, 12 of class 3, 7 of class 2, 16 of class 1, 15 at $1,000 each, 22 at $900 each; clerk in charge, stenographic division, $1,600; chief messenger, $1,000; packer, $900; messenger, $960; 7 messengers; 13 assistant messengers; 7 laborers; 7 watchmen; engineer, $1,200; 2 assistant engineers, at $900 each; 4 firemen; 2 conductors of the elevator, at $720 each; head charwoman, $840; 22 charwomen. Division of Accounts; Chief of Division of Accounts, $2,500; chief bookkeeper and record clerk, $2,000; clerks—3 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 6 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 2 at $900 each; in all, $437,090.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 126, after line 13, to strike out:

The administrative audit of all expenditures under the control of the Department of Justice shall hereafter be made in the Division of Accounts of that Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, line 5, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$50" and insert "$200," so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous expenditures, including telegraphing, fuel, lights, foreign postage, labor, repairs of buildings, care of grounds, books of reference, periodicals, typewriters and adding machines and exchange of same, street car tickets not exceeding $200, and other necessaries, directly ordered by the Attorney General, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, line 9, after the words "repairs of," to strike out "wagons" and insert "vehicles," so as to make the clause read:

For official transportation, including purchase and exchange, keep, and shoeing of animals, and purchase, exchange, and repairs of vehicles and harness, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, line 11, after the words "Department of Justice," to strike out "$31,580.40" and insert "$32,200," so as to make the clause read:

For the rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia used by the Department of Justice, $32,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Commerce and Labor," on page 128, line 6, after the word "superintendent," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500"; in line 7, after the sum "$3,000," to insert "deputy disbursing clerk, $2,000"; in line 10, before the words "of class 4," to strike out "ten" and insert "nine"; in line 11, before the words "of class 2," to strike out "twelve" and insert "thirteen"; in the same line, before the words "of class 1," to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve"; in the same line, before the words "at $1,000 each," to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven"; in line 15, after the sum "$1,000," to insert "forewoman of char force, $840"; in line 18, before the word "laborers," to strike out "eighteen" and insert "seventeen"; in line 19, after the words "chief watchman," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,000"; and in line 20, after the words "in all," to strike out "$170,300" and insert "$174,880," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Commerce and Labor, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; confidential clerk to the Secretary, $1,800; private secretary to Assistant Secretary, $2,100; chief clerk and superintendent, $3,500; disbursing clerk, $3,000; deputy disbursing clerk, $2,000; Chief of Appointment Division, $2,500; Chief, Division of Publications, $2,500; Chief, Division of Supplies, $2,100; clerks—9 of class 4, 11 of class 3, 13 of class 2, 12 of class 1, 11 at $1,000 each, 6 at $900 each; 2 telephone operators, at $720 each; messenger to the Secretary, $1,000; 5 messengers; 10 assistant messengers; 7 messenger boys, at $480 each; engineer, $1,000; forewoman of char force, $840; 3 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 2 conductors of elevators, at $720 each; 2 firemen, at $660 each; 17 laborers; 5 laborers, at $480 each; cabinetmaker, $1,000; carpenter, $900; chief watchman, $1,000; 11 watchmen; 18 charwomen; in all, $174,880.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 129, after line 18, to strike out:

To further promote and develop the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, $60,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 129, line 23, after the words "chief clerk," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,250," and, on page 130, line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$102,160" and insert "$102,410," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Labor: Commissioner of Labor, $5,000; chief statistician, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $3,250; 4 statistical experts, at $2,000 each; clerks—5 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 6 of class 2, 12 of class 1, 9 at $1,000 each; 2 copyists; 2 assistant messengers; 2 laborers; special agents—4 at $1,800 each, 6 at $1,600 each, 8 at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each; in all, $102,410.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items under the subhead "Bureau of Labor," on page 130, line 9, after the word "assistance," to insert "to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $6 per day," so as to make the clause read:

For per diem, in lieu of subsistence, of special agents and employees while traveling on duty away from their homes and outside of the District of Columbia, at a rate not to exceed $3 per day, and for their transportation, and for employment of experts and temporary assistance, to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $6 per day, and for traveling expenses of officers and employees, and for the purchase of reports and materials for the reports and bulletins of the Bureau of Labor, and for subvention to "International Association for Labour Legislation," and necessary expenses connected with representation of the United States Government therein, $64,090.

Mr. WARREN. I move to amend the amendment by increasing the amount from $6 to $7.50.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, before the word "dollars," strike out "$6" and insert "$7.50," so as to read:

To be paid at the rate of not exceeding $7.50 per day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Being on the committee and being the author of the amendment, I will state that I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment. I understand the chairman of the committee agrees that I shall introduce an amendment to come in at the end of the bill providing that hereafter no salary shall be increased by a lump sum.

Mr. WARREN. I shall not object to that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have found, on an examination, that the salary of one man there has been increased from $1,800 to $2,780, of another from $2,000 to $2,780, of another from $2,000 to $2,525, of another from $2,000 to $2,280, and of another from $1,800 to $2,000, besides others ranging from $1,600 up. If we fix this rate, it will give them about the salary they are now receiving, and I propose at the end of the bill to offer an amendment providing that no salary shall be increased from a lump sum.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment proposed by the committee as printed fixes the limit at $6 a day. I think it ought to be $8 a day. I do not think it ought to be split between what is really desired and what the committee has reported. I do not think that the work which has been done and which is expected to be done by these experts can be procured for $7 a day.

Mr. OVERMAN. We figured it out that at $7.50 a day it is just about the salary they are now getting.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe the commissioner ought to have the power to go to $8 per day. I move to strike out "$7.50" and insert "$8." That is the law now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As there is an amendment to the amendment now pending, it would be necessary first to vote upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Iowa says it is the law now. Where does he find that law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am advised that it is in the law now. I can not give the book and the page of the law.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that there is any law about it. I understand it could be $20 or any other sum.

Mr. OVERMAN. He can make it $400 a day if he wants to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not so advised. I will not assert it positvely, because I do not know.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is mistaken about there being any provision fixing the amount of per diem.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may be. I do not assert it on my own examination of the question, but only upon information.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is unlimited, as it is now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I inquire if this sum of $7.50 or $8, as the Senator from Iowa proposes, will leave the compensation of the experts in this bureau about as they are now or will it amount to a reduction?

Mr. OVERMAN. What is proposed by the Senator from Wyoming is about the same as the amount they now receive, as I calculate it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I make the inquiry because I think it would be poor economy, indeed, to reduce the compensation of the class of men upon whose reports we must rely in many, many very important matters of legislation. I doubt the wisdom of the economy that would reduce the compensation of that class of men.

Mr. WARREN. It was not the idea of the committee, I think, to make a reduction. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has the figures.

Mr. SMOOT. The change of amount from $6 to $7.50 per day will affect only two men, and I will admit that they are the two principal men in this department. They are Mr. Verrell and Mr. Croxton.

Mr. CRAWFORD. To what extent will it affect them?

Mr. SMOOT. Three hundred and sixty-five days, at $7.50, would be $2,737.50, and their compensation to-day is $2,760. It would affect the salaries only $22.50 a year.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why should a small change like that be made at all? I know something about these men. We had occasion to use them, as the Senator knows. I know something about the value of their services and their faithfulness and their competency. That is a small compensation for that class of men. Why should we nibble away $35 or $40 from their salaries?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not to affect these men, but other men who might hereafter be appointed. We do not criticize these men or make any reduction, except in arriving at a certain figure. Seven dollars and fifty cents a day will give them about the same salary they are now getting.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would rather see men of that class get three or four thousand dollars rather than put them on starvation wages. I do not believe we will make anything by doing it.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody knows the value of their services more than the Senator from Utah, because I have come in contact with them a great many times.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I know something of their faithfulness and reliability.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the objection to allowing the maximum to be fixed at $8 a day?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that that is probably too much.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator thinks that is half a dollar too mich?

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not apply to these men alone, but to other men who do that kind of work.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it is a difference of only $22.50, and I suggest that we let it go.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is too small a difference to have an argument over it.

Mr. SMOOT. It is. I hope the Senator will not object to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not object. The only thing I want to do is to stop the salaries from being increased, so that when we fix the salary at $1,800 they are not to be given $2,700, or when we fix the salary at $2,000 they are not to be given $2,500. I do not care whether you make this $8 or $9, I want some rule established by which the salary when fixed shall continue, so that the Secretary can not take a lump sum and make the salary larger than we make it.

Mr. WARREN. Let the question be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment. I do not object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee, making the rate $8 per day.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want this to pass, however, without referring to an amendment which I think the Senator from North Carolina will offer, but which can not be offered now, namely, the salary of the four statistical experts. I assume that two of them are the men referred to by the Senator from Utah. At the proper time, if some one else does not do it, I propose to raise their compensation from $2,000 each to $2,760 and $2,520. As this is not the proper time to offer the amendment, I will wait.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 131, after line 22, to strike out:

> In certifying eligibles from the civil-service registers for the purpose of appointment to positions of clerkships in the Census Office hereinbefore provided for at salaries of $1,200 or less, the Civil Service Commission shall, so far as practicable under the law of apportionment, certify those who have had at least one year's experience in census work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 132, after line 3, to insert:

> In making appointments of clerkships in the Census Office, hereinbefore provided for, at salaries of $1,200 or less, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall first select for appointment from those persons who may apply for such positions and who have had at least two years' experience in the Thirteenth Census work of the character required, and whose efficiency shall be certified by the Director of Census. And in making such appointments the quota to which each State shall be entitled under the law of apportionment shall be adhered to as nearly as practicable. If a sufficient number of those having such service and certification of efficiency is not obtainable, such further number as may be necessary shall be appointed from the civil-service registers, and those having had at least one year's service in the Thirteenth Census work shall have a preference right of appointment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend the amendment in line 8, page 132, by striking out "2 years" and inserting "18 months." This bill as passed by the House provided for one year. The Senate committee amendment makes it two years. That would eliminate some of the States entirely from participating in this patronage.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not make it one year, as the House did?

Mr. WARREN. I think we should accept the amendment providing for 18 months.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment, allow me to finish my statement.

To make the time two years, as I have said, would eliminate some of the States entirely from participating in this patronage. It was stated that it was the intention that the apportionment should be maintained, and now some other State probably might require it to be reduced to one year; but the State of Idaho would be entirely eliminated from participating in this if it is retained at two years. None of their apportionment has served two years.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that amendment is——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield the floor?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield the floor, but I will return to it if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say that if that amendment or any amendment reducing the time below two years is adopted, I would then ask that a further amendment be inserted at the end of line 10, which would read:

> Provided, That preference shall be given to those having the longest service.

The reason for that amendment is, that by doing this you are opening a roll of about four hundred. If you would get it down to 18 months, there will be called for, as I understand, about 75 clerks. If length of service is to be a merit, as it should be, in this case, then, at least, you ought not to compel the director in recalling those clerks to go over an entire list of four or five or six hundred, but should make it his duty to give preference to those who had the longest service. Some of them have had from two years to two years and nine months' service, or more than double the length of service that would be required under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator's amendment were adopted, however, it would exclude representatives from some of the States that have just had a chance of getting somebody into the Census Office.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator does not mean that if my amendment is adopted it will do that?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I mean the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota—not that proposed by the Senator from Idaho. If the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted, as suggested by him, as to some of the States which have only had a very few appointees in the Census Office and have had them of late, they would be excluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken in that, because, if he will look at the other amendment, he will find that this would recognize the States as nearly as may be and their apportionment.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow it to apply to the length of service as to the representatives of the States, then I would have no objection at all to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the way it will have to be applied. Now, let me make this clear to Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just in one moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. President, you will remember that on January 10, 1912, because of a lack of appropriation, a very large number of our census clerks were discharged. They were clerks who had been in the office from one year to nearly three years. Subsequently, on February 29, 1912, for the same cause another large number were dismissed. Those were among the very best clerks in the Census Bureau. They were discharged because there was no money with which to pay them. Many of them had had from one year to two years' prior service in clerical work of the same character in the departments, so that their work had become very efficient, and the department would like to retain at least those clerks who have had the longest service in the departments and in the Census Bureau. Were it not for the fact that we did not have the appropriation all of those clerks would be serving at the present time. As the bill passed the other House here was the defect, and that was the reason why the committee made the change. The House provided that these clerks should be upon the civil-service register, but that the Director of the Census should select those having one year's service. It will be seen just how this would work. Under the present law no one from a State who was in the employ of the Government at the same time in one of the departments in Washington could have taken that examination, because under the law such persons would have had to go back to their own State and resided there a year before they could have taken the examination, while those who are within the District of Columbia, being right here at home, could take a day off, take their examination, and be placed upon the civil-service register. So, under the bill as it passed the other House, all who would probably be selected would be residents of the District of Columbia, and none of those out of the great number who are residents of the States could be selected, because they could not have taken the examination.

If you take the population of the city of Washington or of the District of Columbia, say, at about 300,000, or a little over, and compare it with the 90,000,000 population of the United States, you can thereby get the real proportion to which the District of Columbia would be entitled. That would be about 1 out of 250 or out of 300, while, as a matter of fact, they have in these departments actually about 85 per cent of all the positions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rose simply to state what the Senator has just now stated, that, notwithstanding this remarkable civil-service law, which requires an apportionment between the States, the District of Columbia has, I think, about seven times its proportion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it has seven times its proportion on paper, but actually it has seventy times its proportion. As a matter of fact, if we could have a commission to examine that question, we would find that about 80 per cent of all the employees in the Government service are actually residents of the District of Columbia.

In order that the States might be recognized and that we might get those clerks who have had a prior service this amendment was offered. This amendment fixing the service at 2 years, or 20 months, will allow the Director of the Census to make the selections from his very best clerks, and he would make the selections according to the provision in that amendment, which is:

And in making such appointments the quota to which each State shall be entitled under the law of apportionment shall be adhered to as nearly as practicable.

Take that in connection with the amendment I have offered—

Provided, That the preference—

And we can make that "as nearly as practicable"— shall be given to those having the longest service.

In that way the States would be recognized, and those having the longest service would also be recognized. That is all I am asking for.

Mr. HEYBURN. The pending amendment is the one that I have offered, and there is no use incorporating in it the provision with reference to apportionment between the States. If we fix the basis above the number that any State has, we would necessarily eliminate one or many States from participating at all. These clerks came to Washington to take these positions; they are not necessarily residents of Washington; they have become residents of Washington by reason of having been here in office; but it is not fair to consider that every person who resides in the District of Columbia is not a resident of a State as well. I merely cite as an instance of the operation of this amendment as it is presented to the Senate, that in one State, at least, and perhaps in many others, it would result in leaving the States without any representation whatever.

It is not the intention under the civil-service law that any State shall be eliminated from participating in this class of work, and I only sought to bring it within the period of time that would not eliminate one State or perhaps a dozen States. It so happens that if this provision remains at two years, the State of Idaho would have no one upon this roll. It only has one upon the roll, and the service there is, I think, about 18½ months.

I myself think that the provision might, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], have remained as the House sent it to us; but for the purpose of protecting a State in participation at all I have moved to make it 18 months. That would at least save one State from elimination.

If any other Senator has inquired into the question, he may find that it should remain at one year, as the House fixed it. The probabilities are that the House did make inquiry into this matter, and fixed it at a year, so as to drop out no State.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it had been left as the House fixed it, the party to whom the Senator refers could not possibly get into the service at all, because such a person must have been upon the civil-service register, and if such a person were here in the District of Columbia and a citizen of the State of Idaho, he could not have taken the examination here. Therefore he could not have been placed upon the civil-service register.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is not advised that this party is not already on the civil-service roll. I am only asking that the time be placed at 18 months. If any Senator wants to fix it at some other time, it is for that Senator to say so.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the party was on the civil-service roll, he would not be off the roll now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment and I shall be through.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was recognized to ask a question of the Senator from Idaho, but the Senator from North Dakota, unintentionally, of course, displaced me in the Chair's recognition.

I want to ask the Senator whether he believes this amendment will be a continuing power on the part of the Director of the Census; that is—and I am asking for information, because I have taken a very decided position in regard to this question—does he believe that after the 1st of July, 1913, the Director of the Census could fill vacancies from the list of those who have served on the temporary force in the Thirteenth Decennial Census, but who are not upon the civil-service register?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is intended to cover that.

Mr. CUMMINS. If, Mr. President, it bears that construction—and I very much fear it does—I shall resist it to the uttermost as a very serious and dangerous invasion upon the civil service of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, may I interrupt the Senator to call his attention to the civil-service law? The amendment is intended to conform this provision to the provisions in existing law. It says:

And in making such appointments the quota to which each State shall be entitled under the law of apportionment shall be adhered to as nearly as practicable.

It can not be adhered to at all if you eliminate those who have not served——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it could be adhered to in a degree, but what I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate and the Senator from Idaho is this: When we passed the law providing for the last census we provided that those who came upon the force temporarily, as distinguished from those who were part of the permanent force, need not take the examination required by law to entitle them to a place upon the civil-service register, but we provided expressly that that part of the force should not thereafter be eligible to appointment.

Mr. HEYBURN. But they have taken an examination.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, they took an examination, but not the examination provided for in the civil-service law and the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission. I think that the hardship mentioned by the Senator from North Dakota is so great that we ought to do what we can toward appointing upon the force those who were discharged without much notice during the winter, but I am not willing that this power shall continue with the Director of the Census for a longer period than one year. After that time I think everyone who believes in the civil service will agree that the appointees shall come from the civil-service register in the way in which all appointments are made.

This does not apply, of course, to the temporary force who are to be employed under the next paragraph. They ought to have nothing to do with the civil service, to be in harmony with the law under which the census was taken, but I intend to offer an amendment—I do not know whether or not it is pertinent to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, because I have not his amendment in mind—but, after the word "less," at the end of line 5, I intend to suggest an amendment as follows:

During the fiscal year 1913.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not oppose that amendment, because it would carry the provisions contained in the amendment which I have offered until the next appropriation bill came up, and we can probably meet the question then just as well as now. I am sure it is not the intention of the Senator from Iowa that any State shall be eliminated from that participation contemplated by the provisions of the civil-service law.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; on the contrary I should like to see the law more faithfully observed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, that law provides——

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to see each State receive its proper quota.

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to the provision of that law relating to apportionment among the States.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is part of the civil-service law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I think this provision ought to take to itself that same idea.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the purpose of the amendment——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not objecting to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. That the spirit of the civil-service law shall be preserved and carried into the amendment proposed by the committee. To recognize the principle of an equitable apportionment among the States and then deliberately fix a time that would deprive them of the benefit of that law would not be fair.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, Mr. President, the time I was referring to was the time during which the Director of the Census would have power to make appointments outside of the civil service; it was not the time of service of the temporary force of the Thirteenth Decennial Census.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what I was referring to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to, in fact I rather favor, the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was referring to the very principle suggested by the Senator from Iowa; and I hope that the amendment will be adopted, in order that the existing law and the spirit of that law may be retained and that we may not indirectly legislate some one out of a right which he has under the permanent law. Of course, these parties would have to go back to their States, to California, Idaho, or New Mexico, or wherever it might be, in order to take the civil-service examination; they could not take it in Washington, being bona fide citizens of States far distant.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would suggest, in order that the Senator from Idaho may be absolutely certain, that he make it 12 months instead of 18.

Mr. HEYBURN. The House made it 12 months.

Mr. FLETCHER. The House made it 12 months and the Senate made it 24. Now, the Senator proposes to make it 18. I see no reason why it should not be made 12. The objection to that by the Senator from North Dakota was met by the amendment striking out the preceding lines at the bottom of page 131 and the top of page 132. When the House provision as to requiring certification to be made from the eligible list is stricken out of the bill, then the objection of the Senator from North Dakota, it seems to me, falls. It is answered by the striking out of that requirement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would say to the Senator that if we were to recur to the provision in the House bill it might cut out some of these very people. The safest provision is 18 months.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am in favor of striking out the House provision as to the civil-service list; and that, I understand, has been agreed to in the Senate. That having been stricken out, I can see no objection to making the limit 12 months instead of 18.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I prefer that it should be 18. If we retain the provisions of the amendment and continue to eliminate the House provision, it would answer; but I would prefer that it be 18 months, so far as I am concerned; and that is my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, as amended by the Senator from North Dakota, will meet with the favor of the Senate. If there be any doubt in the mind of anybody as to the application of the provision requiring that appointments shall be apportioned to each State, I have no doubt about that because the general provision "And in making such appointments the quota to which each State shall be entitled under the law of apportionment shall be adhered to as nearly as practicable" covers it. If anybody has any doubt about it, of course the Senator from North Dakota might word his amendment in this way:

Provided, That the preference in each State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall be given to those having the longest service.

It seems to me, though, that that is in the provision already. If you make the period 18 months, the reason grows stronger and stronger with the lessening of the period—if you make it still less, there is more reason for it—that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota ought to pass, so that the Director of the Census should not be left free out of a great number of people arbitrarily to select merely favorites, but should select those with the longest service.

It seems to me if we cut the period down and make it one year we are carrying it too far. So far as I have heard, no State would be excluded from any of its quota upon the 18-month basis. I have received no complaint that would tend to show that there was anybody who was excluded; and certainly, if preference is given, those in a State having the longest service should be entitled to employment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota does not desire to press his amendment until after the amendment I have offered has been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move further to amend by inserting after the word "practicable," in line 13, the words:

Provided, That preference shall be given to those having the longest service in such State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator from North Dakota is getting the amendment in the wrong place. It seems to me it ought to come in after the word "census," in line 10, because if you put it in after the word "practicable," in line 13, you are modifying the present requirement of the law as to quotas of the States. It would then read:

And in making such appointments the quota to which each State shall be entitled under the law of apportionment shall be adhered to as nearly as practicable: Provided, That the preference shall be given to those having the longest service.

Mr. McCUMBER. In such States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then you would have to put in "within such State."

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator did not hear. The words "in such State" are a part of my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; I did not understand the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from North Dakota. That eliminates the question of efficiency.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it does not; the Senator is mistaken; because, first, there is a provision for certifying those whose service shows their efficiency; secondly, the certification must be made in accordance with the apportionment of the States as nearly as practicable; and, thirdly, in selecting from the State where there are several candidates the director is to select those of the longest service. That is what it means.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall not object to it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question—the same question, practically, as that referred to by the Senator from Idaho. If his amendment is inserted does it not make length of service, subject to the general qualification that efficiency shall be certified to by the Director of the Census, the criterion of appointment, and eliminate competency, efficiency, and fitness for the work, so that one who is certified as efficient—and in that list there may be very considerable degrees of efficiency—has the preference over those best qualified for the work?

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, if the Senator will read the amendment I have suggested, I think he will see that it is not open by any possibility to the construction that he suspects it might be open to. Let us read it carefully:

In making appointments of clerkships in the Census Office, hereinbefore provided for, at salaries of $1,200 or less, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall first select for appointment from those persons who may apply for such positions and who have had at least 18 months' experience in the Thirteenth Census work of the character required, and whose efficiency shall be certified by the Director of Census.

That is the first thing to be taken into consideration. The next thing to be taken into consideration is the recognition of the State apportionments:

And in making such appointments the quota to which each State shall be entitled under the law of apportionment shall be adhered to as nearly as practicable: Provided, That preference shall be given to those having the longest service in such State.

I can change that and make it certain by inserting the words "and whose efficiency is certified to."

Mr. BURTON. That is already provided for; but there might be, say, 300 certified as efficient, from whom 25 would stand out very prominently as best qualified; and it seems to me that the Director of the Census should have discretion and not be governed exclusively by the time of service.

I am perfectly aware of the argument on the other side that favoritism might be employed, but I do not think much attention ought to be given to that. If the one who has the appointing power is governed by favoritism, we can not avoid it. We must take it for granted that he will be governed by consideration for the promotion of the public service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It occurs to me, in connection with what the Senator from Ohio has just said, that if, for example, 50 people were to be retained and the 300 were all certified as efficient, and you did not have the rule as to priority of employment in proportion to seniority of service, you would throw the door wide open for the appointing officer to show toward those 300 every form of personal favoritism. Of course, he could say it was because he regarded John as more efficient than Peter, or Mary as more efficient than Sally. But, just the same, the door would be thrown wide open for him to do just what the Senator wants to avoid.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will yield, it seems to me we are not adopting the proper criterion for legislation if we frame our laws on the suspicion that some appointing officer will exercise favoritism. If he does that, he is unfit for the place and ought to be removed. The best way is to give him a free hand, and to take it for granted that he will exercise his discretion in such a way as will lead to the selection of the best subordinates.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. President, every law in every free country since the beginning of time has been predicated upon the idea that the incumbent of the office will abuse his power, and that he will not do just what he ought to do.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is why we have the civil-service law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is never a supposition of any other sort; and in passing laws you always provide not that the good man may act well but to keep the other man from acting badly.

The good man is going to give you efficient administration anyhow; so you always legislate with suspicion. Any legislator in a free country that does not proceed upon that basis is proceeding upon a basis that may be apples to the sight but may also be ashes to the taste.

The whole civil-service law is framed upon the idea that, unless restrained, the appointing officer will abuse the power of appointment. There is no other excuse for its existence. Undoubtedly, if the appointing officer would always try to select the best man, regardless of favoritism of his own or of legislators or Congressmen or bosses behind him in the State, or other people, the opportunity to get good service would be much better than if we just have a general schoolmaster's examination. The only object of the whole system is to prevent favoritism; and the only reason why you try to pass laws to prevent favoritism is because you take it for granted that if you do not pass such laws favoritism will exist.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it seems to me the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota destroys the whole idea of the civil service—that is, the idea of fitness ascertained by either examination or experience. I will put the matter to him now in this way:

Suppose, under this law, the Director of the Census should find that North Dakota was entitled to one appointment; that North Dakota had two men who were eligible to the appointment; that both of them had been certified as efficient, but one of them was very efficient and the other moderately efficient; that the former had served in the census work 19 months and the latter 20 months. Then, upon the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota, the Director of the Census would be compelled to appoint the poorer man because he had served half a month longer than the better man.

I can not believe the Senator wants to accomplish any object of that sort. In fact, I know he does not. As I understand, what he desires is to secure the equitable distribution of these places among the States, so that each State may have its fair share. But I can not think it would be wise to take the share of the State and then to distribute the place or the places, as the case may be, according to the rule of seniority. The place or places ought to be given according to the rule of higher efficiency.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can hardly take the State of North Dakota as an example, because no one from my State would be certified under this provision at all. For that reason I am perfectly free to discuss this matter from the standpoint of a person who is absolutly disinterested so far as any constituent is concerned.

The Senator will remember that even under the civil-service law as it now stands three persons are certified for each position. The appointing officer does not, under the present law, have to take the one who is certified as having the highest standing. He has three from whom to select. He can take any one of the three highest, and he may take the lowest of the three highest.

Let us remember, in this instance, that if we put this limitation down to 18 months, there will be at least 400 eligibles from whom 75 persons are to be selected. Under this provision no one will be certified, of course, unless he is certified for his particular fitness for this particular work. He will be certified because he has shown qualifications for this particular work. Therefore there is no great danger of getting a clerk that is not usable, or one that is not particularly fitted for the work, by giving the one an advantage who has had the extra number of days or months of service. I believe there would be more of an injustice done if the director were allowed to select any one from among the 200 or 300 persons than if he were limited to those having the longer service and those whom he has certified to be efficient in their line of work.

Mr. President, those persons are efficient by the best test that ever can be applied. Under the civil service those who stand highest in their examinations do not always make the best clerks. In a few months you will find possibly those who stood lowest in their examinations will become the most efficient clerks; and there is no method of examination so sure, so certain as the actual test of work in the department. And having had from one year to three years' work, when we say this list shall be made up of those who have had 18 months' service, I think the chances are you will get a greater efficiency if you hold the director down to just what the record shows to be efficiency and length of service and recognize the States in accordance with the amendment that has been suggested by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota the consideration of the classification of these clerks. Some of them are expert accountants. Some of them are statisticians. Some of them perform services at $600 or $700 a year and some at $1,700 or $1,800 a year. It would not do to compel the director to select those of longest service without taking into consideration the character of the duties they were to perform. I refer particularly to "one expert accountant."

Mr. McCUMBER. He will attend to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. But if we put in a drastic provision that he shall take only the one of longest service it may be that the one of longest service would not be available for the duties to be performed. I merely make that suggestion.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to know what is the objection to the House provision. I just want to read it:

> In certifying eligibles from the civil-service registers for the purpose of appointment to positions of clerkships in the Census Office hereinbefore provided for at salaries of $1,200 or less, the Civil Service Commission shall, so far as practicable under the law of apportionment—

Which recognizes the very point that the Senator from North Dakota wants to preserve—> certify those who have had at least one year's experience in census work.

That gives the preference to all of the eligibles who have served one year.

Mr. HEYBURN. That does not include these special appointments at all. These are all civil-service employees.

Mr. CUMMINS. The difficulty is that a great many of the temporary clerks are not on the civil-service registers, and can not take the examination.

Mr. McCUMBER. And could not take it for at least a year.

I simply want to explain once more to the Senator that if he will read the House provision he will see that it takes only those in the civil service and those who are on the civil-service register. Now, let us recall that we have had those taken from different commissions and otherwise that have had two or three years' service in clerical work of this kind, and then have had from 18 months to over two years' service in the Census Bureau, doing this same kind of work. The Census Bureau requires about 75 additional clerks at this time. They would like very much now to complete their work to get those clerks who have had this experience in the Census Office; and as the provision was originally drawn it was "two years," but the House provided that only those should be eligible who had taken the examination and gotten on the civil-service roll. The Senator remembers the law. As it stands now no one can be examined and be certified from the State of Kansas unless he has been actually and bodily within the State of Kansas for one year prior to the time he takes the examination. That law was passed for the very purpose of cutting out the fraudulent certification on the civil-service register of people in the District of Columbia who would have themselves certified to the several States and counted as residents of those States.

Now, when they were at work and it became necessary to discharge those who were not on the civil-service roll, those in the District of Columbia, when they saw that a great many would have to go out, could take the examination here and be ready to go right on again, because they live in the District of Columbia and could be certified from the District of Columbia. On the other hand, not a single one from the States could be certified for that place, because he could not go home and take the examination. The result of the House provision, if passed, would be that all of those who took the examination in the District of Columbia, there having been no one in the States now, or scarcely any of them now, who is on the list waiting for positions of this kind—the positions would be filled entirely from the District of Columbia.

To avoid that and to allow each State to have its recognition, and there being several hundred clerks that are as efficient as any kind that could be secured through any kind of an examination by reason of their prior service in the Thirteenth Census, we give each State its recognition and do justice by the department by allowing these to be taken according to the length of service.

Mr. BRISTOW. What I had in mind was to prevent this scramble of 700 or 800 clerks for 75 positions. They will all start to get political indorsements and bring pressure to bear here and there to secure the appointments; and anything that will avoid that and make it come about regularly and orderly and according to merit I would be very glad to favor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the State provision made here, where you must recognize the State apportionment, that will be avoided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 132, line 13, after the word "practicable," insert:

Provided, That preference shall be given to those having the longest service in such State.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the following amendment: Insert, at the end of line 5, page 132, the following words: "during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913."

I offer the amendment, Mr. President, because I fear that the construction of the amendment proposed by the committee would be that after this emergency had passed—that is, two years hence, or three years hence—if the Director of the Census were called upon to fill a vacancy, he could fill it under the provision of this amendment, and not take the appointee from the civil-service register. I do not believe it is intended to supplant the general civil service in the Census Office with any temporary arrangement of this sort. I am perfectly willing that it shall continue for a year, because of the rather extraordinary condition which was created by the dismissal of the force last winter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. May I say that that is guarded in two places. In the first place, the opening paragraph of the bill provides only for 1913. Furthermore, if the Senator notices it, on the same page, below where the amendment comes in, they provide for only one year.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the appropriations apply for only one year.

Mr. WARREN. I am not making an objection. I do not believe it is necessary, but I do not object to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. But this is general legislation, of which this bill is so full. It is changing the law of the United States entirely; and I want the change to run only for one year, and then let us resume our appointments under the civil-service law.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have this read now as amended. I do not know whether or not it will bear the construction for which the Senator contends.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. Page 132 of the committee amendment, at the end of line 5, after the words "or less," insert the words "during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913," so that if amended it will read:

In making appointments of clerkships in the Census Office, hereinbefore provided for, at salaries of $1,200 or less, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall first select for appointment——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is enough. I am a little bit afraid of that construction. The purpose of the Senator is not that those who are appointed shall not become permanent?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that the authority shall continue only during the year?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am afraid that language might be construed to mean that the appointment was to last only during the year.

Mr. HEYBURN. And thus affect the tenure of office?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I think if the Senator would put—at the bottom here—at the end something like this: "This provision shall be applicable only to appointments made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913," there could be no question about the construction.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is possible that the fear expressed by the Senator from North Dakota has some foundation, but if we will transfer the language that I have proposed to line 4, so that it would read "in making appointments during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, of clerkships in the Census Office"——

Mr. McCUMBER. That would make it all right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would prefer that it be done in that way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to see that done, so that there will be no such difficulty as we had when the appropriation was exhausted. The Senator's idea, I take it, is not to affect the tenure of those appointed during this year.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. But only to provide that after the end of this fiscal year such appointments may not be made. Now, as I understood the language read—I do not carry it perfectly in my mind—I am afraid it might be open to the construction that it would affect the tenure of office of those appointed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no. It would read—in making appointments during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, of clerkships in the Census Office [he] shall first, etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just so it does not affect the tenure of office I am satisfied.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not affect the tenure of office. The words I formerly offered I ask to be transferred and inserted after the word "appointments," in line 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. After the word "appointments," in line 4, insert the words "during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913," so that, if amended, it will read:

In making appointments during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, of clerkships in the Census Office.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is not in order at the present time, but I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee as well as of the Senate to the extraordinary classification of the clerks in this office, and to give notice that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment that will bring this classification into something like harmony with the other departments or bureaus of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator kindly wait until the committee itself shall offer an amendment when the times comes? The time is not yet here. The Senator means in the House text of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean this: That we are to have 8 expert chiefs of division, at $2,000 each. Then, of the clerks, we have 4 of class 4, 7 of class 3, 25 of class 2, 340 of class 1, and so on.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will wait a moment I think I can give him an idea of what the committee will propose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the committee had passed on that.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. The committee passed on it in its earlier meetings, but there was a confusion about this which we were unable to dispel, and it has been looked over since, and the subcommittee which had this matter under consideration expects to cover, I think, the faults of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to anticipate the work of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps it will be unnecessary to read it now, then.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly content to wait.

Mr. WARREN. I should prefer that the Senator wait until we offer this amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the committee reclassifies these clerks I shall be entirely satisfied.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in the hurried drafting of this amendment I think I did not make it read exactly as I would wish it. Therefore I move a further amendment by placing the words "in such State" after the word "preference," so that it would read:

Mr. WARREN. In what line?

Mr. McCUMBER. In line 12, where I put in the amendment:

Provided, That preference in such State shall be given to those having the longest service.

I should like to have it read that way, instead of reading as it does now:

Provided, That preference shall be given to those having the longest service in such State.

So that there can be no possibility of misconstruction.

Mr. WARREN. That is all right.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment so as to read:

Provided, That preference in such State shall be given to those having the longest service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be modified as suggested, and the question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 132, line 24, after the word "clerks," to strike out "to be certified for appointment from the civil-service registers" and insert "from among the employees of the Thirteenth Census force," so as to make the clause read:

Temporary clerks: In addition to the employees hereinbefore provided for, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may appoint, on the recommendation of the Director of the Census, for such time as may be necessary, but not beyond June 30, 1913, not exceeding 175 temporary clerks from among the employees of the Thirteenth Census force, such clerks to be paid salaries not greater than $900 per annum, or to be paid on a piece-price basis, and for the payment of the compensation of said temporary clerks there is appropriated the sum of $120,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, line 1, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$50" and insert "$200"; and in line 5, after the word "returns," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$20,000," so as to make the clause read:

For furniture, carpets, ice, lumber, hardware, dry goods, advertising, telegraph and telephone service, photographic work and supplies, transportation and preparing articles for shipment, horses, wagons, electric truck, and maintenance thereof, diagrams, maps, blue prints, awnings, shelving, filing apparatus, fuel, light, office fixtures, street-car tickets not exceeding $200, and other absolutely necessary expenses, including the purchase, rental, construction, repair, and exchange of mechanical appliances, repairs to the Census Building, and necessary expenses in connection with the prosecution of fraudulent census returns, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, after line 14, to strike out:

That from and after July 1, 1912, the Bureau of Manufactures of the Department of Commerce and Labor shall be known as the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

The Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor is hereby consolidated with the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, to take effect July 1, 1912, and the duties required by law to be performed by the Bureau of Statistics are transferred to and shall after that date be performed by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

And insert:

The Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics, both of the Department of Commerce and Labor, are hereby consolidated into one bureau to be known as the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, to take effect July 1, 1912, and the duties required by law to be performed by the Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics are transferred to and shall after that date be performed by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued, as follows:

Those certain duties of the Department of Labor, or Bureau of Labor, contained in section 7 of the act approved June 13, 1888, that established the same, which especially charged it "to ascertain, at as early a date as possible, and whenever industrial changes shall make it essential, the cost of producing articles at the time dutiable in the United States, in leading countries where such articles are produced, by fully specified units of production, and under a classification showing the different elements of cost, or approximate cost, of such articles of production, including the wages paid in such industries per day, week, month, or year, or by the piece; and hours employed per day; and the profits of manufacturers and producers of such articles; and the comparative cost of living, and the kind of living; what articles are controlled by trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor, and what effect said trusts, or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor have on production and prices," are hereby transferred to and shall hereafter be discharged by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and it shall be also the duty of said Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to make such special investigation and report on particular subjects when required to do so by the President or either House of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether I ought to do it or not, but I can not allow this paragraph to pass——

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that the committee have an amendment to offer, and we will take that up later. We will come back to it, and I will call the Senator's attention to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to say that I could not allow it to pass without saying that some of the duties of the Department of Labor transferred to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce——

Mr. WARREN. We propose to correct that. That was overlooked when we went through the bill. I will propose an amendment later on and will call the Senator's attention to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 136, line 10, after the word "bureau," to insert "to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"; in line 14, before the word "stenographer," to insert "chief clerk, $2,250"; and in line 18, after the words "in all," to strike out "$102,610" and insert "$104,860," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: Chief of bureau, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $4,000; assistant chiefs of bureau, one at $3,000, one at $2,750; Chief of Division of Consular Reports, $2,500; chief clerk, $2,250; stenographer to chief of the bureau, $1,600; clerks—7 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 1 at $1,500, 11 of class 2, 14 of class 1, 17 at $1,000 each, 11 at $900 each; messenger; 5 assistant messengers; 4 laborers; laborer, $480; in all, $104,860.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 137, to insert:

For payment of the services of experts, and for other necessary expenditures connected with the collection of facts relative to the internal and foreign commerce of the United States, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 137, after line 4, to insert:

To further promote and develop the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, $60,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 138, line 15, after the word "stationery," to insert "janitor service," so as to read:

Contingent expenses: For the payment of fees to witnesses; for traveling and other expenses when on official business of the Supervising Inspector General, supervising inspectors, local and assistant inspectors, and clerks; for instruments, furniture, stationery, janitor service, and every other thing necessary to carry into effect the provisions of Title 52, Revised Statutes, of the act of April 4, 1888.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 139, line 2, before the words "of class one," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 3, before the words "at $900 each," to strike out "six" and insert "five"; and in line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$33,280" and insert "$33,580," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Navigation: Commissioner of Navigation, $4,000; Deputy Commissioner, $2,400; chief clerk, $2,000; clerk to commissioner, $1,600; clerks—2 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 2 at $1,000 each, 5 at $900 each; 2 messengers; in all, $33,580.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 139, after line 4, to strike out: "Shipping Service: For salaries of shipping commissioners in amounts not exceeding the following: At Baltimore, $1,200; at Boston, $3,000; at New Bedford, $1,000; at New Orleans, $1,500; at New York, $4,000; at Philadelphia, $2,400; at Portland, Me., $1,300; at Port Townsend, $3,500; at Providence, $1,700; at San Francisco, $6,300; in all, $23,200," and insert:

Shipping service: For salaries of shipping commissioners in amounts not exceeding the following: At Baltimore, $1,200; at Bath, $1,000; at Boston, $3,000; at Gloucester, $600; at Honolulu, $1,200; at Mobile, $1,200; at New Bedford, $1,200; at New Orleans, $1,500; at New York, $5,000; at Norfolk, $1,500; at Pascagoula, $300; at Philadelphia, $2,400; at Portland, Me., $1,300; at Port Townsend, $3,500; at Providence, $1,800; at Rockland, $1,200; at San Francisco, $4,000; in all, $31,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 139, line 24, after the word "commissioners," to strike out "$35,000" and insert "$37,000," so as to make the clause read:

Clerk hire: For the compensation to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor not to exceed $1,600 per annum to each person, of clerks in the offices of the shipping commissioners, $37,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 140, line 6, after the word "passengers," to strike out "$500" and insert "$1,000," so as to make the clause read;

For tools, appliances, and instruments for the admeasurement of vessels and the counting of passengers, $1,000

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 141, line 1, after the word "messengers," to strike out "assistant messenger" and insert "two assistant messengers," and in line 2, after the words "in all," to strike out "$59,500" and insert "$60,220," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization: Commissioner General of Immigration, $5,000; Assistant Commissioner General, who shall also act as chief clerk and actuary, $3,500; private secretary, $1,800; chief statistician, $2,000; clerks—3 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 6 of class 2, 8 of class 1, 8 at $1,000 each, 6 at $900 each; 2 messengers; 2 assistant messengers; in all, $60,220.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 141, line 10, before the words "of class three," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; in the same line, before the words "of class one," to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve"; and in line 12, after the words "in all," to strike out $60,260" and insert "$63,060," so as to make the caluse read:

For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," namely: Chief of Division of Naturalization, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $3,000; clerks—4 of class 4, 7 of class 3, 8 of class 2, 12 of class 1, 8 at $1,000 each, 2 at $900 each; messenger; 2 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $480; in all, $63,060.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 143, line 12, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$50" and insert "$100," so as to make the clause read:

For fuel for heat, light, and power; office expenses, stationery, books and periodicals (subscriptions to periodicals may be paid in advance); traveling expenses; street-car tickets not exceeding $100; expenses of the visiting committee; expenses of attendance of American member at the meeting of the International Committee of Weights and Measures; and contingencies of all kinds, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 144, after line 11, to insert:

Children's Bureau: For the following as authorized by the act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be known as the Children's Bureau," approved April 9, 1912, namely: Chief of bureau, $5,000; assistant chief of bureau, $2,400; statistical expert, $2,000; private secretary to the chief of bureau, $1,500; clerks—2 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 1 of class 2, 1 of class 1, 1 at $1,000; special agents—1 at $1,400, 1 at $1,200; copyist; messenger; in all, $25,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor, on page 145, line 16, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$100" and insert "$300"; and in line 18, after the sum "$60,000," to insert "and in addition thereto sums amounting to $66,500 shall be deducted from other appropriations made for the fiscal year 1913 and added to the appropriation 'Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor,' in order to facilitate the purchase through the central purchasing office as provided in the act of June 17, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 531), of certain supplies for bureaus and offices for which contingent and miscellaneous appropriations are specifically made as follows: General expenses, Light-House Service, $8,000; stationery, Bureau of the Census, $10,000; miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of the Census, $15,000; books and periodicals, Bureau of the Census, $500; contingent expenses, Steamboat-Inspection Service, $3,000; contingent expenses, shipping service, $500; instruments for measuring vessels and counting passengers, $500; expenses of regulating immigration, $13,500; equipment, Bureau of Standards, $1,000; general expenses, Bureau of Standards, $1,800; general expenses, Coast and Geodetic Survey, $4,200; miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Fisheries, $8,500; and the said total sum of $126,500 shall be and constitute the appropriation for contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor, to be expended through the central purchasing office (Division of Supplies), Department of Commerce and Labor, and shall also be available for objects and purposes of the several appropriations mentioned under the title 'Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor' in this act," so as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce and Labor: For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the offices and bureaus of the department, for which appropriations for contingent and miscellaneous expenses are not specifically made, including the purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, blank books, pamphlets, maps, newspapers (not exceeding $2,500), stationery, furniture and repairs to the same, carpets, matting, oilcloth, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, fuel, lighting and heating; for the purchase, exchange, and care of horses and vehicles, to be used only for official purposes; freight and express charges, postage to foreign countries, telegraph and telephone service, typewriters and adding machines, including their exchange; repairs to the building occupied by the offices of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; storage of documents belonging to the Bureau of Lighthouses, not to exceed $1,500, and for storage of documents belonging to the Bureau of Labor, not to exceed $750, street car tickets not exceeding $300; and all other miscellaneous items and necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $60,000, and in addition thereto sums amounting to $66,500, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 146, line 24, after the words "Commerce and Labor," to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$55,000," so as to make the clause read:

For rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia for the use of the Department of Commerce and Labor, $55,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Judicial," on page 147, after line 10, to strike out:

No circuit judge shall hereafter be appointed until the whole number of circuit judges shall be reduced to 29, and thereafter there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges.

Mr. WARREN. There are Senators who are not present now who wish to discuss the matter of the Commerce Court. These four lines refer to that court, and I ask that the amendment may be laid aside for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the amendment in lines 11 to 14, on page 147, will be temporarily passed over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that we have a departure suggested in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and which will probably have to be agreed to, whereby it is provided that—

Hereafter one-half of the fees collected on account of permits, certificates, and transcripts of records issued by the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of the United States.

Again, on a subsequent page, it is provided that—

SEC. 11. On and after July 1, 1912, fees collected by the District of Columbia shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in equal parts, as follows, namely: Fees of superintendent of weights, measures, and markets; fees of surveyor's office; health department fees; pound fees; fees for railing permits; fees for building permits; fees for electrical permits; bathing beach fees; fees from public-convenience stations; fees for tax certificates; fees for motor and horse-drawn vehicle tags; fees of the municipal court; and the surplus fees of the recorder of deeds and register of wills; together with the tuition of nonresident pupils in public schools, and the tax of one-half of 1 cent paid by any street or other railroad company for each passenger carried across the Highway Bridge; and the annual wheel tax on all automobiles or other motor vehicles.

All those fees heretofore have gone into the treasury of the District of Columbia without any division, without one-half going into the Treasury of the United States. That has prevailed from 1879 to the present time.

I want to call attention to a memorandum sent me by the Auditor of the District of Columbia, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. WARREN. One moment. I do not understand what bill the Senator is reading.

Mr. GALLINGER. I read from the District of Columbia appropriation bill, showing that they have departed from the custom which has prevailed since the organic act of 1879 was adopted, and they propose now to divide the fees between the District of Columbia and the Government of the United States in those various offices, which fees have heretofore gone into the treasury of the District of Columbia exclusively.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator the pending bill before him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator look on page 148, line 10? I will ask if it is that to which the Senator refers? The language there reads: "One-half of which shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what the auditor objects to. The auditor of the District of Columbia sends me this memorandum:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 4, 1912.

Memorandum for Senator GALLINGER.

Respectfully referring to the possible action of Congress in requiring all fees collected by the District of Columbia to be deposited to the credit equally of the United States and the District of Columbia, I wish to invite your attention to a matter that arises in connection with this subject, and which, to do the District justice, should be taken into consideration as a part of the matter mentioned. I refer to the fees collected by the clerk of the court of appeals and the fees collected by the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. In the case of the first-mentioned court all the expenses are paid by specific appropriations authorized by Congress, one-half of which the District is chargeable with, while all the fees collected in this court are paid into the Treasury wholly to the credit of the United States. In respect to the fees collected by the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the surplus fees remaining after the payment of salaries are covered into the Treasury wholly to the credit of the United States. The appropriations for the salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, for the payment of witness fees and jurors, and for the expenses of that court are paid one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

If it is the proposed intention of Congress to require fees collected by the District of Columbia to be credited equally between the United States and the District, every equitable consideration demands that the District should receive like treatment in the matter of fees collected by the clerks of the court of appeals and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the case of the former the District to be credited with one-half of all fees collected and in the case of the latter with one-half of surplus fees.

This seems to be a matter of simply equity. Perhaps I ought not to state what the result of our conference on the District of Columbia will be, but I will venture to say the probabilities are that the conferees will have to agree to those provisions of the bill.

Mr. President, I have two amendments which I desire to offer to the pending bill which will remedy the matter complained of by the Auditor, and which may go to conference and be considered in connection with the District of Columbia bill.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator, it is my desire to serve the wishes of my colleague on the committee so that we may have the matter before us. Of course now we are acting on the amendments of the committee and not otherwise on the text of the bill as passed by the House. The Senator will reserve his amendments or give them to the Clerk here. We shall put them in at the proper place.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will reserve them until the proper time.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 23, page 147, the last paragraph read being as follows:

Retired judges: To pay the salaries of the United States judges retired under section 714 of the Revised Statutes, so much as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. HEYBURN. While it is not strictly a committee amendment, yet there should be after the word "Retired," in line 19, the words "justices and" before "judges." They have an official designation, and the bill makes no provision for retired justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator investigated to see what the current law is? I think it exactly as the text is here in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know what the law must be. You must provide for the salary of retired justices.

Mr. WARREN. When we review the bill for amendment, if the Senator will have his amendment ready, it can be then considered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have several amendments to offer to conform to the necessities of the occasion.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will put them in shape, when the time comes I will call his attention to the item.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 148, line 10, before the word "each," to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,500," and, in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$36,510" and insert "$37,410," so as to make the clause read:

Court of Appeals, District of Columbia: Chief justice, $7,500; two associate justices, at $7,000 each; clerk, $3,250, and $250 additional as custodian of the Court of Appeals Building; assistant or deputy clerk, $2,250; reporter, $1,500: Provided, That the reports issued by him shall not be sold for more than $5 per volume; crier, who shall also act as stenographer and typewriter in the clerk's office when not engaged in court room, $1,000; three messengers, at $720 each; necessary expenditures in the conduct of the clerk's office, $1,000; three stenographers, one for the chief justice and one for each associate justice, at $1,500 each; in all, $37,410, one-half of which shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 148, after line 17, to insert:

Clerk of District Court, Northern District of Illinois: For clerk of the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, authorized by the act of July 31, 1894, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 149, line 21, after the word "stationery," to insert "supplies, freight, telephone and telegraph, heat, light, and power service, drugs, chemicals, and cleansers, furniture, and printing," so as to make the clause read:

For rent of necessary quarters in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, $7,000; for necessary traveling expenses of members of the court and clerk, $330; for books, periodicals, and stationery, supplies, freight, telephone and telegraph, heat, light, and power service, drugs, chemicals, and cleansers, furniture, and printing; for pay of bailiffs and all other necessary employees not otherwise specifically provided for; and for such other miscellaneous expenses as may be approved by the presiding judge, $8,000; in all, $15,330.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 150, to insert:

United States Commerce Court: For clerk, $4,000; deputy clerk, $2,500; marshal, $3,000; deputy marshal, $2,500; for rent of necessary quarters in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and furnishing same for the United States Commerce Court; for books, periodicals, stationery, printing, and binding; for pay of bailiffs and all other necessary employees at the seat of government and elsewhere, not otherwise specifically provided for, and for such other miscellaneous expenses as may be approved by the presiding judge, $50,000; in all, $62,000.

Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to inquire——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that amendment is at the top of page 150 and relates to the Commerce Court. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me a moment, I will say that it is my desire to lay aside for the present the provisions affecting the United States Commerce Court and to go on with the remainder of the bill.

Mr. REED and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield, and to whom?

Mr. REED. I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming had the floor.

Mr. REED. I had addressed the Chair, and the Senator from Wyoming rose to ask that the bill be laid aside.

Mr. WARREN. If I have the floor, I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee why it is not entirely practicable to house the Court of Customs Appeals in some public building in Washington. Why is it necessary to be paying rent for quarters for that court?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Department of Justice is without buildings, and, for that matter, so are nearly all of the courts. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has a building, and I believe the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has also; but the other courts have to rent quarters.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice there is a great difference in the amount paid for the rental of quarters by the Court of Customs Appeals and the Commerce Court. The Court of Customs Appeals pays $7,000 for their quarters, while the Commerce Court pays $12,000.

Mr. REED. I simply made the inquiry. I do not suppose there is any remedy for it in this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment at the top of page 150 will be temporarily passed over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to that particular provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object to its being passed over without action?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I reserve the right to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not intend to prevent the Senator from speaking now, but only wanted to know if the Senator objected to its being passed over without action.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no desire to speak on it at this time, but I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming, and for that reason reserve the right to object. I do not think that I will object to its going over, but I wanted to inquire what plan the Senator from Wyoming has as to taking up the various portions of the appropriation bill relating to the Commerce Court?

There is another provision later on in addition to this, and one other which probably will be discussed somewhat in the Senate, and it is doubtful whether they can be concluded this afternoon. I understand there are a large number of other amendments to be offered to the bill on going over it again which will not involve any discussion. I desire to ask the Senator if he will agree to let the Commerce Court matter go over until to-morrow?

Mr. WARREN. My intention is to let the three different paragraphs relating to the Commerce Court go over until we have otherwise finished the bill, and at this hour of the evening I feel sure that we shall not any more than finish, and perhaps can not finish, the remainder of the bill; so I think the Senator is safe in assuming that everything relating to the Commerce Court will go over until to-morrow; in fact, I shall agree to that now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To be taken up at the conclusion of other matters in the bill, or to be taken up at a certain time to-morrow?

Mr. WARREN. I am sure that we shall not be able to take it up to-day at all, but I shall endeavor to get this bill up to-morrow as early as possible, and the provisions which the Senator has in mind, I presume, will be among the first matters to be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the provisions referred to will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 150, line 13, after the word "bailiff," to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800"; before the word "two," to insert "one at $1,500"; in line 15, before the words "at $1,200 each," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; and in line 18, after the words "in all," to strike out "$56,480" and insert "$57,080," so as to make the clause read:

Court of Claims: Chief justice, $6,500; four judges, at $6,000 each; chief clerk, $3,500; assistant clerk, $2,500; bailiff, $1,800; clerks—one at $1,600, one at $1,500, two at $1,400 each, two at $1,200 each; stenographer, $1,200; chief messenger, $1,000; three firemen; three watchmen; elevator conductor, $720; two assistant messengers; two laborers; two charwomen; in all, $57,080.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 150, line 23, after the word "repairs," to insert "including bicycles," so as to make the clause read:

For stationery, court library, repairs, including bicycles, fuel, electric light, electric elevator, and other miscellaneous expenses, $3,900.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I notice the language "repairs, including bicycles." Is that intended to mean including repairs to bicycles, or is it intended to mean including bicycles?

Mr. WARREN. It occurs immediately after the word "repairs," and I should construe it to mean the repairs of bicycles. I may say to the Senator that the bicycle question and the street car question are very closely intermingled. Without bicycles, which the messengers usually furnish themselves, it is necessary, in sending them on long-distance trips, to give them street car tickets; and we thought this a reasonable request.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is all right if some man will not conclude that this will give the right to go and buy a bicycle.

Mr. OVERMAN. We could say "including repairs to bicycles."

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the bill says "including bicycles." It reads:

For stationery, court library, repairs, including bicycles.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator has any misgivings about that, he can insert between the word "including" and the word "bicycles" the words "repairs to."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would not consider that necessary if the Senator himself were dealing with the appropriation, or if most people were; but when a bureau is dealing with an appropriation I think it well to make it specific.

Mr. WARREN. This, however, is a court, and not a bureau.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, courts are infinitely worse than bureaus when it comes to construing the manner in which they may spend money.

Mr. WARREN. Let the provision be amended to read "including the repairs to bicycles."

Mr. GALLINGER. By inserting the words "including repairs to."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "including" the words "repairs to," so as to read "including repairs to bicycles."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 152, after line 3, to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That during the fiscal year 1913 no vacancy occurring in the classified service of any executive department or other Government establishment within the District of Columbia, except forecasters in the Weather Bureau, shall be filled except by promotion or demotion from among persons employed within the District of Columbia in such departments or establishment: Provided, That if in the judgment of the President the exigencies of the service require, and he shall so order, transfers may be made during the fiscal year 1913 from among persons employed within the District of Columbia in one executive department or other Government establishment to fill vacancies that may occur in the classified service of another executive department or other Government establishment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 152, after line 18, to strike out section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That on and after July 1, 1913, all appointments to positions in the classified service of the executive departments within the District of Columbia provided for at annual rates of compensation shall be made, after the probationary period of six months shall have expired, for terms of five years each; at the expiration of each such appointment the employment of each person so appointed shall cease and determine; and the employment of all persons in the classified service of the executive departments within the District of Columbia, at annual rates of compensation, who were appointed prior to July 1, 1912, shall cease and determine, unless previously separated from the service, on the 30th day of June, 1917: Provided, That all persons separated hereunder from the classified service shall be eligible for, and may, in the discretion of the head of the executive department, be reappointed without examination for additional periods of five years if at the time of such reappointment they shall be up to a fair standard of efficiency and capable of rendering a full measure of service in return for the salary of the place to which they may be appointed: Provided further, That in reducing the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the head of any department from removing any time for good and sufficient cause any employee of his department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, we are going so rapidly one can not find what is stricken out. What is the subject matter of this part of the House bill stricken out?

Mr. WARREN. Shall I give it in concrete form to the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Section 4 provides that during the next fiscal year no vacancies occurring in the classified service shall be filled in any of the departments; and section 5 provides for the five-year tenure of office for civil-service employees—that is, that their terms shall all expire at the end of five years, and only those who then pass an examination shall be reappointed. In place of section 5, which occupies more than a page, we have inserted another section, known as section 4, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 153, after line 21, the committee propose to insert:

SEC. 4. The Civil Service Commission shall, subject to the approval of the President, establish a system of efficiency ratings for the classified service in the several executive departments in the District of Columbia based upon records kept in each department and independent establishment with such frequency as to make them as nearly as possible records of fact. Such systems shall provide a minimum rating of efficiency which must be attained by an employee before he may be promoted; it shall also provide a maximum rating below which no employee may fall without being demoted; it shall further provide for a maximum rating below which no employee may fall without being dismissed for inefficiency. All promotions, demotions, or dismissals shall be governed by provisions of the civil-service rules. Copies of all records of efficiency shall be furnished by the departments and independent establishments to the Civil Service Commission for record in accordance with the provisions of this section: Provided, That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all that matter may be passed over for the present without prejudice and be taken up later.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wishes to pass it over, I have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think we had better look into it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the provision will be passed over temporarily.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 154, line 18, to change the number of the section from "6" to "5."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 155, line 1, to change the number of the section from "7" to "6."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 155, line 19, to change the number of the section from "8" to "7," and in line 23, after the word "apartments," to insert "except for telephone tolls required strictly for the public business, and so shown by vouchers duly sworn to and approved by the head of the department, division, bureau, or office in which the official using such telephone or incurring the expense of such tolls shall be employed," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That no money appropriated by this or any other act shall be expended for telephone service installed in any private residence or private apartment or for tolls or other charges for telephone service from private residences or private apartments, except for telephone tolls required strictly for the public business, and so shown by vouchers duly sworn to and approved by the head of the department, division, bureau, or office in which the official using such telephone or incurring the expense of such tolls shall be employed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 156, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 9. That no money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used after the 1st day of October, 1912, for services in any executive department or other Government establishment at Washington, D. C., in the work of addressing, wrapping, mailing, or otherwise dispatching any publication, except maps, weather reports, and weather cards issued by an executive department or other Government establishment at Washington, D. C., or for the purchase of material or supplies to be used in such work; and on and after October 1, 1912, it shall be the duty of the Public Printer to perform such work at the Government Printing Office. Prior to October 1, 1912, each executive department and other Government establishment at Washington, D. C., shall transfer to the Public Printer such machines, equipment, and materials as are used in addressing, wrapping, mailing, or otherwise dispatching publications; and each head of such executive department and other Government establishment at Washington, D. C., shall furnish from time to time to the Public Printer mailing lists, in convenient form, and changes therein, or franked slips, for use in the distribution of publications issued by such department or establishment; and the Public Printer shall furnish copies of any publication only in accordance with the provisions of law or the instruction of the head of the department or establishment issuing the publication. The employment of all persons in the several executive departments and other Government establishments at Washington, D. C., wholly in connection with the duties herein transferred to the Public Printer, or whose services can be dispensed with or devolved upon another because of such transfer, shall cease and determine on or before the 1st day of October, 1912, and their salaries or compensation shall lapse for the remainder of the fiscal year 1913 and be covered into the Treasury. A detailed statement of all machines, equipment, and material transferred to the Government Printing Office by operation of this provision and of all employments discontinued shall be submitted to Congress at its next session by the head of each executive department and other Government establishments at Washington, D. C., in the annual estimates of appropriations.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the amendments striking out section 9 and section 10 be reserved.

Mr. WARREN. Section 10 is already reserved, because it relates to the Commerce Court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 10 is reserved. Section 9 will also be passed over. The Secretary will state the amendment striking out section 10.

The SECRETARY. On page 157, after line 20, it is proposed to strike out section 10, as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Commerce Court is abolished on and after July 1, 1912, and all laws in so far as they provide for the establishment of said Commerce Court are repealed. The jurisdiction now vested in the Commerce Court is hereby transferred to, and vested in, the district courts of the United States. All cases pending in the Commerce Court at the date of the passage of this act shall be transferred forthwith to said district courts. Each of said cases shall be transferred to the district court wherein it might have been filed at the time it was filed in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect, and if it might have been filed in any one of two or more district courts it shall be transferred to that one of said district courts which may be designated by the petitioner or petitioners in said case, or, upon failure of said petitioners to act in the premises within 10 days after the passage of this act, to such one of said district courts as may be designated by the judges of the Commerce Court. The judges of the Commerce Court shall have authority, and are hereby directed, to make any and all orders and to take any other action necessary to transfer as aforesaid the cases then pending in the Commerce Court to said district courts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be temporarily passed over.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. WARREN. The committee has certain amendments to offer. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On behalf of the committee the Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 22, before the word "assistant," it is proposed to insert the word "first."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I also offer an amendment, to come in on lines 10 and 11, page 11. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that this amendment proposes to strike out the word "newspapers," as the Senator heretofore suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, lines 10 and 11, it is proposed to strike out the words "and newspapers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I also offer an amendment to come in on page 13, line 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 19, it is proposed to strike out the heading "Congressional Directory" and insert the heading "Joint Committee on Printing," and on page 13, after line 22, to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

For inspector for the Joint Committee on Printing, as provided for in section 20 of an act to provide for the public printing and binding, approved January 12, 1895, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, by request of the chairman of the House committee, I move to amend a little House matter according to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 15, it is proposed to strike out "$720" and insert in lieu thereof "$900," and in line 20 to make the total read "$92,150."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On page 29 there is a total to be corrected because of an error in the original print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has already been unanimous consent given for the Secretary to correct all totals.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but this is an error in the original print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "$100,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$105,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 41.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, line 5, it is proposed to strike out "$2,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2,500"; and in line 6, before the word "document," to insert "1, at $1,000."

Mr. REED. What is the reason of the change from $2,000 to $2,500?

Mr. WARREN. It gives the salary provided in the current law, and I am informed by an officer of the Treasury Department that there was an error in sending up the papers. This merely leaves the man at the same salary he is now drawing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is further proposed to amend the bill by striking out, in line 7, the words "assistant messenger" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two assistant messengers," and, in line 8, to make the total read "$13,100."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the following amendment, which brings the amount of rent to cover what has been formerly given in two places.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, line 10, strike out "$48,850," and insert in lieu thereof "$52,000."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is that?

Mr. WARREN. There was a division of rent before, and the rent for the Supply Department had appeared in another place; but it was left out of the other place, and so we put it in here.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment I now offer is to restore to the Baltimore Subtreasury the amount of the estimates. The reason it was overlooked when the bill was under consideration by the subcommittee is that the member of the Committee on Appropriations from Maryland was expected to visit the committee and correct us up, but illness prevented his coming. I will ask that the amendment be accepted.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "three clerks, at $1,800 each," and insert in lieu thereof "paying teller, $2,250; receiving teller, $1,900; exchange teller, $1,800; vault clerk, $1,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The other amendments offered by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 61, in line 14, to strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three," and to strike out "$34,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$34,950."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, on page 61, line 23, there is some ambiguous language in reference to the Boston office; and the amendment I send to the desk is simply to make the language effective.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, line 23, after "$1,100" insert "each," so as to read "three clerks, at $1,100 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, on page 68, line 1, I move to strike out "$2,300" and insert "$4,100," to make it conform to the estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. In the provision for the hydrographic office we provided for a new station at Panama, but did not insert any funds. I therefore wish, in the amendment I send to the desk, to raise the amount from $11,000 to $13,500.

The SECRETARY. On page 90, line 7, it is proposed to strike out "$11,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$13,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I also send to the desk the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 103, line 12, after the word "maps," it is proposed to insert:

Including maps, showing areas designated by the Secretary of the Interior under the enlarged homestead act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. And on the same page, in line 13, it is proposed to strike out "$2,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I now offer the following as to the Census Office.

The SECRETARY. On page 131, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the word "four," where it first occurs, and insert "eleven"; in line 15 it is proposed to strike out the word "seven" and insert "twenty"; in line 15 strike out the word "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-two"; in line 16 strike out the words "and forty"; in line 16 strike out "one hundred and forty-three" and insert "eighty-three"; and in line 17 strike out "fifteen" and insert "eighty-seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Following next is an amendment relating to the Bureau of Labor, to which I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 135, lines 23 and 24, to strike out the following words:

And the comparative cost of living, and the kind of living.

Mr. WARREN. That leaves it with the department as it now is.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I have an amendment on page 136, which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 136, line 15, it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "seven"; in line 15, it is proposed to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve"; in line 16, it is proposed to strike out "fourteen" and insert "fifteen"; in line 18, to strike out "$102,610" and insert "$110,660."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I may say, in extenuation of the fact, that the committee offers amendments of this kind, that the jointure of different bureaus under the departments required a review, which has been made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is just a reclassification, it is not?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The total is the same?

Mr. WARREN. The total in this case is a little more, because we had inadvertently left out some of the employees.

The following amendment is in relation to the employment in the Bureau of Standards of what both the Department of Commerce and Labor and the Treasury Department regarded as a very necessary officer.

The SECRETARY. On page 141, line 22, after the figures "$4,800," it is proposed to insert the following:

Physicist qualified in optics, $4,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it had been my intention to scan rather closely any amendment to that class of appropriation. In about 9 or 10 years the appropriation for this bureau has grown from $25,000 to $286,000. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee, in charge of the bill, in regard to this appropriation for the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Bureau of Standards had an estimate in here of a very large amount.

Mr. OVERMAN. They wanted $500,000.

Mr. WARREN. As I remember, it was an increase of something like thirty-five or thirty-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. OVERMAN. Thirty thousand dollars more than at present.

Mr. WARREN. Thirty thousand or more dollars than the bill carries. We were not able to agree to allow that, and except in one or two unimportant matters we took the current law. But this one matter has been very sharply brought to the attention of the committee since the subcommittee considered the matter through a letter from the Treasury Department to a member of the committee. I will say that I do not believe much in these late subestimates. Department officials ought not to address different Senators, even though they may be members of the committee. They ought to come directly to the committee itself. But I am informed that this is a very important matter and have been willing to insert it. I think it ought to go in and pass.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not know what there is about it that is important. The bureau is not an important one. It has been growing at a wonderful rate. We started to have a small bureau to perform small duties. We started with $25,500 in the appropriation bill of 1901, and have now grown to $426,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree that in this case we appropriate a great deal more than we ought to. We put up this building out here, and there has been a great amount of hauling backward and forward. They have put up a building away out here near Chevy Chase.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is such a slight need of this bureau as to justify a close investigation in regard to these very large appropriations. We should give some attention to the functions performed by this bureau, and it is high time we did. Here is an addition of $400,000 in 10 years to the annual cost of this bureau, which has no very responsible or extensive duties to perform.

Of course, it was supposed during consideration of the pure-food bill that this bureau would be invested with the duty of establishing standards, and in anticipation of that event, which never transpired, they laid out a great system of elaborate buildings and bureaus and divisions and expensive employees.

But the pure-food law did not call for any services at the hands of the Bureau of Standards. The courts by the bill as it passed the Senate were made the judges of the standards and of infractions of the law. When the bill came over from the House it did provide for a Bureau of Standards, but the Senate passed a bill upon different lines, and in conference the Senate method and provision were adopted and became the law.

This bureau has curious items. The Senator from New Hampshire has directed my attention to one:

Expenses of the visiting committee: Expenses of attendance of American member at the meeting of the International Committee of Weights and Measures—

Now, listen to this—and contingencies of all kinds, $25,000.

That language in an appropriation bill is so indefinite and reckless as to attract attention. That item is $25,000. The bill is full of items of that kind. I do not expect at this time to be able to accomplish very much more than to direct the attention of Senators to this bureau. But I have carried my copy of the bill marked for some suggestions that may be taken under consideration.

The bureau was created by the act of March 3, 1901, volume 31 of the Statutes at Large, page 1449. There has been no legislation since that original act which would justify any such growth or exaggeration of this item of appropriation. It is purely the building up by a bureau of an establishment based upon a very small foundation. I hope Senators will look into it. I will call attention to the original provision in reference to the officers of this bureau:

One director, $5,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming if he is willing that this item should go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I shall object to this item. It never has been brought before the subcommittee. I cross-examined the man who appeared before us about this very office. He has two physicists here. He has got an assistant physicist and he wants an increase. I should like to have inserted in the RECORD what this man desires out there. We declined to increase his appropriation a solitary cent, and here this amendment is offered on the floor without having had consideration by the committee, and I object to it.

The chairman has been very fair to me on every item he has offered here; but this item has never been submitted to me as one of the subcommittee, and I protest against it. I want to say it is not a committee amendment, because it never has been before the committee. I am not criticizing the chairman, because I think he understood it had been brought to my attention.

Mr. WARREN. I did; yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that it has not been, and it never has been brought to the attention of the committee at all. We rejected the proposition in the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I will say, however, if the Senators who are now on the floor will permit me, that I am very tired, and so are other Senators; and I would be glad if the bill might go over with this matter pending. I will ask to have the bill come up to-morrow morning immediately after the morning business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 11, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 10, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we come to Thee with unbounded faith and confidence in Thine infinite wisdom, power, and goodness. Realizing our dependence on Thee, we pray for light to guide us in the way of truth, for strength that we may resist evil, for energy that we may push forward unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. In His spirit. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 8, 1912, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 21597. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 22261. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 23557. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 23063. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers of said war;

H. R. 21230. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 20585. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 19476. An act granting certain lands to the State of California to form a part of California Redwood Park in said State;

H. R. 17679. An act to make Bay City, Mich., a subport of entry; and

H. R. 16674. An act to establish a subport of entry and delivery at Indiana Harbor, in the State of Indiana.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

House concurrent resolution 43.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the folding room, 100,000 copies of Public Health Bulletin No. 51, being a report on the cause and prevention of typhoid fever, with special reference to conditions observed in Yakima County, in the State of Washington, by L. L. Lunsden.

LIFEBOATS ON ARMY TRANSPORTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 23626) to appropriate $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to equip all Army transports with all lifeboats and rafts necessary to accommodate every person for whom transportation facilities are now provided on said transports and the crews of said transports, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18642, to revise the metal schedule, with Senate amendments; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to that; but I think we ought to have a larger number of Members present, and I therefore make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman to withhold the point for a moment so that the request may be submitted that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, I ask the Chair to put the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raises the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Anthony	Borland	Burleson

Gould	Levy	Riordan	Young, Mich.

The SPEAKER. The roll call shows 223 Members present, a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were ordered to be opened.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House represents the metal schedule, and has three amendments that were placed on it by the Senate; one reduces the duty on pig iron from 8 per cent to 6 per cent; the second amendment reduces the duty on the ferro alloys from 15 per cent to 10 per cent; and the third amendment is a repeal of the law known as the Canadian reciprocity act.

I move, Mr. Speaker, to concur in the first Senate amendment, the amendment reducing the rate of duty on pig iron from 8 per cent to 6 per cent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to concur in the Senate amendment reducing the tariff on pig iron from 8 to 6 per cent, and the Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the duty on pig iron has been fully discussed in this bill before. I do not believe that this reduction will work serious injury to the people engaged in the business. It will entail a loss of revenue of about $49,000. I believe that the rate fixed in the original bill was a fair rate, but as the Senate has only added two amendments to the bill itself, and the only objection we have to the two amendments from our standpoint is the loss of revenue, which I believe we can stand, I think the House should concur in the two Senate amendments. The first, the one now before the House reducing the rates on pig iron, will produce a loss of revenue of $49,000. The amendment reducing the rate on ferro alloys from 15 to 10 per cent will amount to a loss of revenue of $252,000. I believe myself that the former rate on the ferro alloys was a fair revenue rate. Ferro alloys are not used by people generally, but are used by the manufacturers. I do not think the amount of tax placed on the manufacturer was unfair, but as the total amount of revenue that will be lost in this bill by reason of these two amendments amounts to only $301,000, and by agreeing to the two Senate amendments it brings the two Houses together on the bill, so far as these two amendments are concerned, and the iron and steel bill is concerned, I believe that the House should concur in both amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman, before he takes his seat, if he reported this bill back to the House with the recommendation that the House nonconcur in all the amendments?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not.

Mr. PAYNE. Was that the direction of the committee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was not.

Mr. PAYNE. Was a motion made in committee to nonconcur to all the amendments?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was not.

Mr. PAYNE. Was a separate vote demanded on the amendment repealing the reciprocity act?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A motion in committee was made to concur in two amendments and to disagree to the amendment No. 3, and a separate vote was demanded in committee on that motion. The bill is reported to the House in conformity with the action of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman what the total loss of revenue would be by the bill if the Senate amendments were accepted. I did not know that the report was coming up this morning, and so I have not my papers here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the estimate, when the bill was reported to the House last winter, was that the loss of revenue would be about $800,000. I am stating it from my recollection.

Mr. PAYNE. And this is an additional loss of revenue to the amount of $300,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; it will make a loss of revenue on the iron and steel schedule of about a million dollars. But if the Senate desires to pass the excise-tax bill that we sent to them, it will more than make up for the loss of revenue in this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I gather from what the gentleman says that he will move to nonconcur in the third amendment, in relation to reciprocity, and the bill will have to go to conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senate may yield, and it may be unnecessary for it to go to conference.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the gentleman will ask for a conference if the House nonconcurs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to do so.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there an understanding that if we nonconcur in the third Senate amendment that they will yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No understanding whatever; but my purpose is to concur in the amendments of the Senate as put upon this bill itself, the amendments that relate to the iron and steel bill. The other amendment is not germane to the bill, and when we reach that amendment I will state to the House why I think the House should disagree to it.

Mr. PAYNE. It is germane to the bill under the Senate rules and under all rules of the House previous to this House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I can take the gentleman's own record upon that question and satisfy him that this amendment is not germane, but we will discuss that when we come to it.

Mr. PAYNE. There is one further question I desire to ask. I am at a disadvantage, because I did not know that this was to come up this morning. What was the equivalent ad valorem on pig iron under the present law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My recollection is that the equivalent ad valorem on pig iron under the present law was about 15 per cent.

Mr. PAYNE. And under the present law there has been an increase of importations of pig iron.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from New York that under the present law ferromanganese is included in the estimate with pig iron and, of course, lowered the ad valorem rate; but, with ferromanganese included, the rate was about 10 per cent, and excluding ferromanganese, leaving it to pig iron proper, the rate was 15 per cent on pig iron. As to the importations of pig iron, the pig iron imported during the fiscal year 1911 amounted to 54,000 tons in the United States as a whole. Of that amount about 40,000 were imported on the Pacific slope, leaving only about 14,000 tons that were imported on the Atlantic coast line. Considering the fact that last year the production of pig iron in the United States amounted to something like 26,000,000 tons, I do not think, with an importation of 54,000 tons in the United States, but 14,000 tons on the Atlantic seaboard, where the real competition takes place, that a reduction of this rate would jeopardize the industry.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know. You can get down to the revenue rate, and when you get there you encourage importations. The more you get below it the more you encourage importations proportionately, and it would look as though the gentleman were guessing on this important industry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would answer that by saying that I am stating the facts. I have stated the facts to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is guessing on the rate of 6 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I have stated to the gentleman from New York many times before, and as the gentleman knows, the railroad rate upon pig iron going into the interior, after you have traveled a few miles from the seaboard, amounts to a prohibition of importation. The only place where there can be any importation is immediately on the seaboard, and that is the point where you can raise the revenue. I do not hesitate for a moment to say that if you put pig iron on the free list it would not affect the price when you cross the Allegheny Mountains, or even for some distance this side of the Allegheny Mountains, because the railroad rate going west—this being a heavy commodity, and the freight rates being high proportionately—would exclude competition when you get a few hundred miles away from the Atlantic seaboard, even with free trade. It is possible to raise a reasonable amount of revenue right along the coast line, and I do not think that anyone can say that 8 or even 6 per cent is an unusual or unreasonable tax or a prohibitive tax. So low a rate as 6 per cent, the rate we propose to concur in, is certainly a revenue tax and will produce some revenue at the seaboard. If the Senate had not made this reduction and had left the amount at 8 per cent, there would have been produced a revenue of half a million dollars. As it is, there will be a loss of revenue as estimated by the experts of some $49,000 under this item.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman is aware that a large proportion of the pig iron used in manufactures is used on the immediate seacoast.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNE. A large portion of it, practically, on the seacoast.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of the pig iron manufactured?

Mr. PAYNE. Of pig iron.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Manufactured?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; a large percentage of it is used on the seacoast or near it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is not informed. The gentleman does not understand the iron and steel industry.

Mr. PAYNE. I am well enough informed to make that assertion, and make it good from information I could present to the gentleman from Alabama, and, further than that, there is a point on which you can take pig iron into the interior and not cross the continent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from New York should not be so reckless in his statements. He must know that more than half, or at least half, of the production of pig iron in the United States is in the Mississippi Valley, and it rarely ever crosses the Allegheny Mountains for sale.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I say a large proportion is manufactured and used not far from the Atlantic coast and there is a point of duty or free pig iron that can be taken into the interior.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman must know there is a very small proportion of the manufacture of pig iron or its use that lies east of Pittsburgh and Bethlehem; that it does not amount to 5 per cent.

Mr. PAYNE. That is true; a small proportion is manufactured, but a larger proportion is used in manufacture east of the Allegheny Mountains than that, a much larger proportion. But as far as I can understand the gentleman, he has no data by which he can say whether 6 per cent will largely increase importations or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say to the gentleman candidly I do not think it will increase importations. It might increase importation to some 20,000 tons on the Atlantic seaboard, but not over that.

Mr. SHARP. As I gather from what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says, he bases his supposition of the loss of revenue upon last year's business—that is, on the business of 1911—taking into consideration a reasonable increase of importations by reason of the reduction of rates. The reason I asked that question is because, having been at one time for several years engaged in the manufacture of pig iron myself, I have been greatly interested in this discussion, and I never hear the talk about the loss of revenue without my memory going back to a time when we imported into this country in a single year about 1,000,000 tons, or 20 times as much, according to the gentleman's statement, as we did last year. Now, the importation of pig iron into this country depends very largely upon the home market price, and the price upon the demand and supply. During the last few years some of our pig-iron manufacturers have been running along at almost no profit at all. I speak from absolute knowledge when I say some of the furnaces have not made one dollar for another covering a portion of that time. Just as soon as the business revival comes, then the price will commence to pick up, and just as soon as the price of that commodity exceeds a certain level, then we will have importations from England and from Germany, so that it seems to me that there is no real apprehension on the part of the gentleman from Alabama that we are going to lose any of our revenue by this modest reduction, because as soon as the revival comes our prices will increase from $3 to $5 a ton. I will appeal to the record of any iron-trade journal, and if you will turn back to its pages of five years ago you will find within this very month the price of pig iron ranged from $5 to $8 more than to-day, or more than it has been at any time during the past four years. I do not, however, want the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to gather encouragement from the fact that it is in view of a Democratic Congress, because all of this depression came under a Republican Congress and under a high tariff, but it does seem to me that the gentleman from Alabama is unduly apprehensive in stating that there is going to be any loss of revenue at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not apprehensive. The gentleman misunderstood me. I stated the loss of revenue would only be $49,000, which is not a great amount. I am not the one who has the apprehension.

Mr. SHARP. I believe the revenue will be very much larger than it was during the past year as soon as the business revival comes, which we are bound to have again. I think the importance of this tariff question in its various phases is apt to be overestimated in so far as a high tariff is considered a panacea for all industrial ills or a low tariff a portent of disaster. We have cycles of business depression, and the present one has lasted four or five years. We are due soon to get a business revival, independent of whether we have a Democratic or a Republican Congress, and when that time comes, and when the level of prices goes up higher than it is now, we will have naturally increased importations from other countries. It is bound to follow as it has followed for the last 20 or 30 years. When business was booming in the pig-iron industry, at least, we had heavy importations, because they could afford to ship it from England and Germany and undersell us, and so they did to the extent, as I have said, of nearly a million tons in one year, if my memory is correct.

In my judgment, such a duty as shall be low enough to prevent a monopoly by enabling fair competition and at the same time high enough to afford sufficient revenues to run our Government, with the incidental protection resulting therefrom, will in the long run give the most stability to our industries and the greatest prosperity to our people.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, under the order of the House, the bill is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. HILL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is recognized.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss the effect of this amendment upon the manufacture or price or importation of pig iron. I desire now only to call the attention of the Members of the House to the statement which has just been made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that he recognizes the fact that this reduction from 8 to 6 per cent on pig iron involves a reduction of revenue of $49,000 and on ferroalloys involves a reduction of $250,000. From the 4th day of April down to now there has not been a report made by that committee, or by its chairman, that has not been directly the reverse of that proposition, namely, that the result of the reduction of duties would be that the importations would increase accordingly and the revenues would not fall off in proportion. Now, he comes before the House and admits that the revenues will fall off. I read from the report of the committee on the wool bill, as follows:

> It is apparent that the reduction of the rates will tend to increase importations, other things being equal, but in estimating the probable extent or proportion of the increase in importations many difficulties are encountered and many factors have to be considered.

And in that very report the committee itself estimated for the increase of importations to the amount of about sixty millions of woolen products, and so argued to this House that they would not lose but a million and a half dollars of revenue all told. Now he comes and says that the effect of the reduction will be a total loss represented actually by the reduction, when his whole argument has been heretofore that it would involve an increase of importation that would counteract the effect of the reduction of rates.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is misstating what I said. I did not say there would be a total loss of this revenue.

Mr. HILL. I understood the gentleman to say it would amount to $49,000 loss of revenue on pig iron and $250,000 loss of revenue on the ferroalloy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is not a total loss of revenue.

Mr. HILL. I think the House so understood it. If the gentleman will look at the facts, he will see it is a very pronounced loss of revenue. It seems there is only one conclusion we can reach. Eight is low enough. I shall vote against the amendment, for the effect of reducing the rate still further is simply to make a bid for further importations to supplant American products, take labor away from American workmen and transfer it to Europe. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to say that if this reduction from 8 to 6 per cent is made that that will make a reduction of revenues of $49,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Over what it would have been if it remained as it is to-day.

Mr. CULLOP. But that does not take into consideration that importations may be increased, and instead of making the reduction of 2 per cent, or of $49,000, the increased importations will in all probabilty increase the revenue more than $49,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is misfaken.

Mr. CULLOP. I am asking for information on that subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The increases given were not made by me. They were made by the experts of the Ways and Means Committee. In making their estimate on this item they took into consideration that there would be some slight increase of importation by reason of a reduction of rates, and then estimated the revenue at 6 per cent instead of 8 per cent. So the whole problem was taken into their calculation. I only stated the loss of revenue to the House, in order to be perfectly candid with it, from the information I have had. The loss of $49,000 on this particular item is not very material.

Mr. CULLOP. I should think not, in view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, of the benefit which would be derived by the 93,000,000 of people who consume this material in the United States, and it seems that in all probability a larger reduction upon this item might have been made to very great advantage to the 93,000,000 of consumers in this Republic.

The loss of revenue is a mere bagatelle compared with the benefits to be derived. Any reduction covered by the estimate given is problematical. It may increase the revenue by the more extensive use of the products.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CULLOP. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PALMER. I understood the gentleman had concluded. I rose for recognition.

Mr. CULLOP. The loss of revenue, I say, is a mere bagatelle compared with the direct benefits, and if the people can not get along under this reduction, it seems to me that the American people are in a very bad plight. The truth is, as I understand it, that we can produce this article not only more cheaply than any other country in the world, but we are actually doing it. We are doing it in the State of Alabama to-day—producing pig iron more cheaply than any other people in the world—and we need fear no competition from any quarter of the world.

Now, how could this reduction shut down an industry, turning a single laboring man out of employment? On the contrary, it would employ more men, it would operate more industries, from the simple fact that more product would be consumed and a greater demand would thereby be made for the consumption of the product on account of the reduction of the price. For one, I am most heartily in favor of the Senate amendment, and would vote to make the reduction more than it has made it. And I believe that the country would prosper the better if a greater reduction were made.

Recent disclosures concerning the tariff in certain lines of manufacturing have so clearly demonstrated the unreliability of claims made by those engaged in operating protected industries, that it has shaken the faith of the people in any contention they make. So exaggerated have been their statements, and so unfounded their contentions, that one can not persuade himself that they emanate from any other purpose than greed and avarice. It is a well-known fact that we can in this country, and are daily doing it, produce cheaper than in any country in the world. This fact is so clearly established by statistics, by the trade, and by the daily experiences of the people, that it is beyond the cavil and doubt of the most skeptical. Let us then here legislate in favor of the ultimate consumers of this country and not for the beneficiaries of special privilege. It is now time we legislate in favor of suffering humanity, to improve their conditions, that they, the many, shall enjoy the benefits of government and special interests suffer the surrender of some of its unfair legislative advantages. In agreeing to this amendment we are doing for the people the right thing and injure none.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PALMER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who criticizes the committee and the majority because we are now agreeing to a further reduction in the revenue under this schedule of the tariff law. The fact is that, even admitting the loss of revenue by reason of the Senate amendments numbered 1 and 2 to this bill, unless the experts who have estimated the revenues under the new rates with the estimated imports are entirely and grossly wrong, this bill, if it shall become a law, will raise at least a million dollars more revenue than the present schedule under the Payne law.

The reason for that is this: It is true that when the bill was brought in, the estimate was made that there would be a loss in revenue of about $800,000. That happened because it was a comparison of the estimated revenue with the revenues received at the customhouse under the Payne law during the past year. Under the Payne law there are included revenues to the amount of nearly $2,000,000 which were received at the customhouse but came back under the rebate clause in the bill.

Take, for instance, tin plate, which yields a matter of $1,800,000 of revenue per annum. Every particle of that tin plate which is brought into the country is brought in for reexport, and 99 per cent of that duty is paid back. The rate which we write into this bill upon tin plate is such as will permit tin plate to come into the country not for reexport but for domestic consumption, so that the revenue on tin plate, amounting to at least a million dollars under this proposed law, will actually come into the Treasury and stay in the Treasury, so that there will be a gain of a million dollars right there.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who comes from a very large iron district, whether he thinks this reduction in the rate of duty will have the effect of reducing the selling price of pig iron in this country?

Mr. PALMER. It may slightly, in some quarters, reduce the price of pig iron.

Mr. HILL. If it will reduce it in some quarters, why not in all quarters?

Mr. PALMER. Because the competition which will result in increased importations by reason of the reduced rate will not go all over the country by reason of the freight tariffs.

Mr. HILL. Conceding that it will reduce the price, will it reduce the domestic production?

Mr. PALMER. It will widen the zone of competition, bringing it a little farther inland by reason of the lower rate, and, of course, the increased competition will in some instances result in lower prices.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. WARBURTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The question being taken, the Senate amendment was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, strike out the word "fifteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in Senate amendment No. 2. As I stated before, this amendment reduces the rate fixed in the bill from 15 per cent to 10 per cent on the ferroalloys. The ferroalloys are ferromanganese, ferrosilicon, and the other iron alloys that are used by the manufacturers of steel as a mix to perfect their steel. For instance, ferrosilicon is put into the steel during its manufacture for the purpose of liquefying the molten mass and preventing blowholes in that steel. A very small proportion of ferroalloy is used in a ton of steel. The entire tax would fall upon the manufacturer and not on the consumer.

Mr. GARNER. If I understood the gentleman's first statement correctly, concurrence in these two amendments would result in a loss of revenue of about $300,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And the manufacturers will get the benefit of that reduction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of this reduction.

Mr. GARNER. And the people—that is, the consumers—will get no benefit from this reduction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think not.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, it is in keeping with the action of another body in reducing the tariff for the benefit of the manufacturers while not considering the ultimate consumer?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think myself the rate of 15 per cent was a fair revenue rate. I see no reason for reducing the rate on ferroalloys for the benefit of the manufacturer, but by concurring in the two amendments we bring the two Houses together on this bill. The bill carries a great many items that are of interest to the American people and the American consumer, and I do not think the House can afford to stand up and fight the Senate on these two items when by passing the bill there will be great benefits result to the people generally.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is willing to accept this situation for the great good that will come out of the entire schedule, rather than to nonconcur?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; in other words, I desire to get the two Houses together and send the bill to the President.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which the Clerk has reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, after line 14, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the act entitled 'An Act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes,' approved July 26, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be a duty of $2 per ton paid on the paper described in section 2 of said act."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment No. 3, in relation to the Canadian reciprocity act.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the Senate amendment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to concur in or agree to the Senate amendment at this stage of the proceedings would not have precedence of a motion to disagree. If the bill was in conference the gentleman's motion would have precedence, but the bill not being in conference I do not think it takes precedence over the motion I have already named.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Chair has any doubt about that, I would like to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not any doubt. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is a preferential motion. Does any Member wish to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to be heard on his motion, I will yield the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, the report of the committee upon this amendment is very interesting. It says:

This amendment is not germane to the metal schedule, having no connection with the revision of the tariff duties in that schedule.

Mr. Speaker, if this amendment is not germane to the metal schedule then I would like to have the gentleman from Alabama tell this House what possible schedule this amendment could be germane to and what possible method there could be for this House to ever bring up that question in any amendment to any tariff measure that is ever reported. I want to take Members of the House back for a moment. When they say that it is not germane to this schedule, I want to remind them that this reciprocity law covers a very large part of the metal schedule. For instance, it covers all kinds of agricultural machinery, portable engines and boilers, cutlery, automobiles, iron ore, brass, rolled iron or steel sheets, galvanized iron or steel wire, barbed wire, rolled iron in rods, and so on.

Certainly it deals with this schedule to a very marked degree, and having said that let us see how consistent the Democratic majority has been with reference to germaneness. Go back with me to the special session when the cotton bill was passed by this House and there came back from the Senate two amendments to that cotton bill, namely, the chemical schedule and the steel schedule. Was either schedule germane to the cotton schedule? But, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I desired to address myself to principally.

It is the question of who shall now take the responsibility of keeping this reciprocity law upon the statute books of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] A short time ago when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] was making a speech, some questions were asked upon that side of the aisle as to who was responsible for this law in the first instance, and it was said a number of times by a number of gentlemen that the President of the United States was responsible for it, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] during that debate used this language:

The fact remains that his party—the Republican Party—and his party's chieftain, with whose nomination he claimed he would be entirely satisfied, are responsible for the legislation the gentleman now seeks to denounce because he believes it is unpopular with the farmers of this country.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the President of the United States and the Democratic Party in this House and in the Senate must share the responsibility for writing this Canadian reciprocity act upon the statute books, but Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for keeping it there lies alone with you on the other side of the aisle in the vote we will soon take. [Applause on the Republican side.] You can not escape that responsibility. You can not say that if this amendment is concurred in the President will be more likely to veto the bill, because the President of the United States in his campaign speeches has said over and over again that this Canadian reciprocity law was a dead issue.

[The time of Mr. LENROOT having expired, by unanimous consent he was permitted to proceed for five minutes more.]

He has said over and over again that this was a dead issue, and I have no doubt, and neither have you, that if the repeal of this law were sent to the President of the United States as an independent proposition he would sign the bill, because, aside from the merits of the proposition, we have a different situation presented now than when this law was passed. Since that time Canada has rejected it, and shall this great Nation of ours continue to hold out an invitation to Canada, saying that in all the years to come, if the conditions shall some time arise where you believe it will be to your advantage to accept this law you may do it, but we on this side of the line shall have nothing to say about negotiations looking to conditions as they may then exist. Is that statesmanship? Take the case of a treaty with a foreign nation which had been rejected by that nation, would anyone say that the United States should continue to hold out that treaty and bind itself with it in the future whenever that other nation chose to accept it and that they should have the right to accept it at any time and our hands should be tied?

Mr. Speaker, whatever views may have been held upon this side of the aisle in the past with reference to this Canadian reciprocity law, I do say that since Canada has acted the repeal of this law ought to receive the support of every Republican. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was never supported by a Republican majority either in the House or the Senate, and I know and many of you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle know, that the vote that you shall cast here to-day upon this amendment, if you shall follow the Committee on Ways and Means, means your defeat in the next House. I know Members upon that side of the aisle who sweat blood every time they think of Canadian reciprocity. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that the President of the United States himself wishes that he had never heard of the term. [Laughter.]

I am going to ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment shortly and we are going to get them. We are going to put you gentlemen on record. You are going upon record at this time. I am going to be interested in seeing how many of you on that side of the aisle are brave enough to stand up in the call for the yeas and nays saying that you are not cowards, but that you are willing to go upon record upon this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I was surprised that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] should challenge this side of the House to show their courage on a tariff bill. If there is any proposition that has ever come before the American people in my time and the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin, upon which there can be no doubt where the Democratic Party stands, it is on its position with reference to a revision of the tariff downward in the interest of the consuming masses of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I have this to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin: I believe in relieving the men who work in the factories and in the foundries and who have to purchase their daily bread as well as the men who work in the field or who stand behind the plow.

The gentlemen on that side of the House would revise the tariff in the interest of their own constituents and then maintain a high protective tariff wall for the benefit of their own constituencies, even if it made the hungry people in the cities starve. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman must base that statement on the fact that I have voted for nearly all of his bills.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but the gentleman has not voted to reduce the price of agricultural implements. The difference with the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself is there is not a bill that has come before this House that retains a high tariff on the products of my constituents that I have not voted to reduce it first. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And then, Mr. Speaker, when that is done I have a right to demand of the gentleman from Wisconsin and his colleagues, when they get free wire and free ties and agricultural implements for the benefit of his constituency, that he will give free bread and free meat to the toiling masses of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not right now. I want to say this: I voted for the Canadian reciprocity pact at the instance of your President and our President—the President of the United States. I thought he was right. I did not believe then that that bill would injure the great agricultural interests of the Northwest; I do not believe it would to-day if it became a law. But I want to say to the gentlemen who answer the roll on that side of the House when they vote for the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to concur in this amendment, that I challenge the gentleman's statement when he says the President of the United States has taken the back track and is ready to repeal the Canadian reciprocity treaty. I deny that fact and I challenge him to produce any proof of it. More than that, I have reason to know that that is not so. I have had those who are interested in desiring to have this pact repealed come to me as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee from which this legislation started, and I have told them if they wanted to discuss that question with me they must first go to the President of the United States and ask him to send a message to Congress saying that he had changed his position in the matter. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know they went to your President and I know that no message has yet come from the White House saying that the President of the United States has changed his position or would sign a bill repealing the Canadian pact. Now, what do we do? We have brought a bill before this House reducing the duty on iron and wool products half in two. We have got a bill pending here that proposes to give your constituents free fencing wire and to our constituents on this side of the House free ties for their cotton, a bill in which we propose to give to the toiling women of America free sewing machines, a bill that reduces more than half in two the iron and steel commodities that go into the homes of our farmers. We have concurred in the only amendments that are germane to this bill put there by the Senate that stand in the way of it becoming a law.

You know and I know that if we should concur in this amendment repealing the Canadian reciprocity pact, that is not germane to the bill, that has nothing to do with this bill, and we send the bill to the President, we invite his veto to this iron and steel bill with an absolute certainty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the gentleman from Wisconsin and his colleagues on that side of the House cast their votes to concur in this amendment they know as well as I do that they cast their votes to defeat revision of the iron and steel schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They know that they make an impossibility of enacting this legislation into law. They know that they deny to our farmers a reduction of their taxes on those iron and steel items in which they are interested that are in this bill. Now, why should we repeal it? The gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentlemen on that side of the House say it is dead. Well, now, if it is dead and means nothing and can not hurt the farmers, why should you seek to put it on this bill except that you desire in an indirect way to defeat this legislation? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say to you that there has never been any final action by the Canadian Government against Canadian reciprocity. There has been no vote in the Canadian Parliament. It may be true that it was an issue in the campaign. It may be true that it is supposed that a majority unfavorable to this legislation has been elected, but it is also true that at the last election in Canada they sent back liberal majorities favorable to this legislation. [Loud and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is well known in the House as a matter of record that while I was not able to be present because of sickness during the consideration of this reciprocity bill at an earlier time that I was paired in favor of the bill for Canadian reciprocity. [Applause on the Republican side.] I was in favor of it then because I believed that the bill applied only to 8,000,000 people living on our borders; that it was not a threat or a menace, and would do no injury to the American farmer.

I believe that to-day. And if Canada had accepted the reciprocity I believe now there would be no word of dissent in the United States. But they did not accept it. It is pettifogging to say that they never have repudiated it by vote. They did repudiate it. It was necessary for them to accept it before it became the law between the two countries. It is a dead issue. We can not have reciprocity on those lines. If we get rid of that and cut it off the statute books, we may in the future have some reciprocity, perhaps more reciprocal than it would be under the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me right there?

Mr. PAYNE. I will if I can get more time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the gentleman extending his time. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the only law on the statute books that authorizes the President of the United States to make reciprocal trade relations with Canada is section 3 of this very act you are seeking to repeal, that has a special provision in this law to-day, authorizing the President of the United States to make further reciprocal trade agreements with Canada.

Mr. PAYNE. The President of the United States found law enabling him to present this agreement to Congress, and he can always do it. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. Speaker, there was another provision of that law. It put print paper on the free list. This proposed repeal puts the duty of $2 a ton upon print paper. Nobody could argue against the justice of that duty, if we are to have any duty at all under the whole line of duties. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this motion to concur. It is no answer to that for the gentleman to say that this amendment is not germane to the metal bill. When we had the metal bill before the committee, and when we had a bill coming over here covering the whole chemical schedule, that did not hinder the gentleman from Alabama from concurring in the amendments. It is no answer to say that any man can hide his vote behind the rule of the House that this is not germane. A question comes up here and it is for all of you to decide by your vote whether you are in favor of keeping this reciprocity act upon the statute book or not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman says he is in favor of free meats. His proposition for free meats was for free meats from all the world—from Argentina, from Australia, from the ends of the earth. That was a threat to the American farmer. That did affect him, because it opened up the markets to the whole world. Whether it would reduce the price of meats to the man in the city I have grave doubt, because I notice when a little duty of 5 or 10 per cent is taken off of an article the middlemen manage to absorb the duty, and they collect the amount that did go into the Treasury of the United States, and the consumer, and especially the ultimate consumer, pays as big a price as he did before. The farmer's price for meat would not have been so great under that bill in all human probability. The "farmers free-list bill" was introduced, and you tried to fool the people by its name, while striking a blow at farm produce. The farmers would never have agreed to that. They did not want that any more than they wanted Canadian reciprocity, and a large majority of them did not want that. They are afraid of this law now. It is nothing but a menace. It does no good. Therefore, I am in favor of voting to accept the amendment. The gentleman assumes that the President of the United States, if you can get this off, will sign this metal schedule. The President of the United States believes in protection, and you strip many of the articles of the metal schedule entirely of protection. You bring it in, not as a protective bill, but as a revenue bill, pure and simple. That is your profession. That is what you have succeeded in making, except where you jump at some of the duties, or all of the duties in the bill. And while one paragraph of the bill may be protective, the next is simply for revenue, and the next is simply a free-trade paragraph that you insert in the bill.

What warranted the gentlemen to assume that William H. Taft will ever sign such a mongrel tariff-for-revenue bill as this metal schedule, whether there is such an amendment on it as that repealing Canadian reciprocity or not? No, Mr. Speaker; I am in favor of this amendment. I am in favor of this motion. I am in favor of repealing that reciprocity agreement, and I am in favor of getting $2 a ton on print paper, too. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I voted in favor of Canadian reciprocity a year ago, believing it to be a wise and beneficent act of statesmanship, and I do not propose to vote to repeal it now. [Applause.]

It is true that they have had an election in Canada, but the Canadian Government and its Parliament have not officially passed upon this question. Canada is a great country, extending over vast regions, with a sparse population, and it is difficult in so short a time to get a coherent and definite expression of national opinion among so scattered a people.

I believe the people of Canada were misled at that election. They had altogether too much assistance from the great interests of our country, acting in concert with their own, and they pronounced judgment upon a fictitious issue. I am therefore in favor of giving Canada a distinct chance to recall her purely provincial utterance and to speak, if she can do so, with the voice of a nation.

I do not propose to attempt to reargue the benefits of reciprocity, which I have more than once presented to the House. Reciprocity was pressed upon the attention of Canada as involving annexation to this country. If I were to give an opinion upon that point, I should say that those political ties are most apt to be permanent which coincide with the material interests of a people, and that such ties are subjected to a severe strain when they are maintained at the sacrifice of natural advantages. If I am correct, then reciprocity would certainly not weaken the present political relations of Canada. Political relations are in greater danger from laws which stand in the path of commerce than they are in from laws which recognize commercial rights. The Tories of Lord North's breed on both sides of the Atlantic should remember that taxation laws framed to divert trade from its natural channels will be more fraught with danger to the continued possession by Great Britain of her colonies than the more enlightened policy which she has recently been pursuing. If the great Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and Manitoba are prevented from trading with their neighbors across the border, in Minnesota and other States, and if the price of their continued allegiance to the British Crown is to compel them to send their produce 2,000 miles to the seaboard and then across the ocean, and to pay preferential duties of 33 per cent in order to force them to consume British goods, then I think no better way could be devised to lead those great Provinces to drift away from Great Britain and to cause the dismemberment of the Empire.

But this is no concern of ours. Canada must work out her own destiny. It is for her to say whether the obstruction of the pathway to her natural markets, whether, indeed, complete nonintercourse with the United States will be the tie to bind her more firmly to the motherland. Even in that event I imagine we shall be able to survive. This arrangement will benefit us, but Canada relatively much more.

I believe it will keep our friendly relations with Canada on a more secure basis. It will open up to our consumers a wider area of supply, and will tend to check the fast-mounting prices of foodstuffs without doing harm to a single interest in our country. And while I agree that if this agreement is to be repealed, it should be repealed root and branch, and should not except print paper or anything else contained in it, still I am in favor of giving to Canada a chance to reconsider her action and to pronounce, as I believe she will, in favor of the policy which has been uniformly favored by Canadian statesmen for 50 years. [Applause.]

I believe it is of vital importance to that country. Upon one side Canada loses herself in the frozen recesses of the Arctic and can trade with no nation to the north; to the east and to the west she has a narrow frontage upon the navigable ocean; her important ports are locked up for half the year with ice, and for a considerable time great icebergs lie across the track of her commerce; but to the south, for nearly 4,000 miles, and separated from her by no natural frontier, there extends an almost illimitable market. With all her vast stretches of territory, if you separate her from us by a high-tariff wall, her points of contact with the outside trading world will be very few. If she is to force the currents of her commerce through the long and artificial channels east and west, if she is to carry on her trade with the world by means of the ocean alone and be prohibited from trading with us and from our seaports in the winter time, she can never expect to be more than the mere shadow of a nation, and she will have a contracted, a withered, and a deformed growth.

In the Canadian campaign last summer there was a great show of indignation because the President had said in a speech that Canada was at the parting of the ways, and yet you will find in his message of the 26th of January of last year that he said of the Canadian people, "They are coming to the parting of the ways." No one then charged that he meant annexation.

Sir Wilfred Laurier, in a speech made a few days ago, is quoted as saying to President Taft:

> I have to tell him that Canada will never be an adjunct, and I say to Mr. Taft that the consent of the Canadian people to become an adjunct can not be obtained by all the wealth and profits of the United States.

Sir Wilfred need give himself no anxiety. The wealth of the United States will never be employed to make Canada the terrible thing Sir Wilfred imagines an adjunct to be, although some of it, I believe, was employed last summer to lead her to maintain her icy, if not splendid, isolation. If President Taft had meant annexation he could easily have said it in that private letter, but the fact that he did not say it, and coupled the expression with a statement of commercial advantages likely to accrue to his own country, shows beyond question what his meaning was. It was only after imaginations had become superheated by appeals to prejudice, and annexation had been developed as a bogy to frighten the Canadian people into a decision against their own best interests, that this expression of the President and the term "adjunct," clearly used in a commercial sense, could be given a sinister meaning.

Mr. CANNON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in five minutes I can do nothing more than to state that I am going to vote to concur in the Senate amendment. [Applause.] I voted against validating the so-called reciprocity agreement with Canada about 12 months ago. It did not meet with my approval. I think it was a great mistake that that agreement was made, secretly made, without notice to the country and sent to Congress for ratification. My objection to validating the agreement was stated then at length. The House was kind enough to listen to me for two hours at that time. The strongest objection I had to it was that it gave a premium to people of the United States to go into northwestern Canada and develop the large undeveloped areas there. It encouraged the loss of our good citizens—multiplied thousands of the best that we have.

A majority of the Republicans in the House voted against validating that agreement, but almost a united Democracy voted for it. You said it was your kind of a revenue law, and the only objection you had to it was that it did not go far enough. And then, hotfoot, you passed what you called your farmers' free-list bill, which you proclaimed to be a great boon to the farmer, by which you placed meats from the Argentine, from Australia, from everywhere in the world, upon the free list, and placed cereals upon the free list for the benefit of the farmer. Oh, God save the farmer and the country from such legislation as you would give them, and only He could save them if you had full power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I say again, I shall vote to repeal this act of Congress. It may be that Canada never would agree to it. That is for Canada to say; but to give Canada the opportunity through the coming years to agree to validate this treaty at her sweet will, or to continue to reject it, is giving Canada an advantage that I am not willing to give her, because I believe the agreement is vicious.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I should like just a few minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. It is bad enough that during the remaining months of this Congress the country should be subject to legislation, or attempted legislation, at the hands of a Democratic House, but it is worse that 96,000,000 people should sit still touching this legislation and leave it to the sweet will of Canada to legislate for us. I should like to hear you answer that proposition when you go upon the stump this fall.

Touching the $2 a ton upon print paper, I am for it. I voted for it in the Payne bill as it passed the House. We had an investigation of that subject. The bill went to the Senate and an amendment was made there fixing the duty, I believe, at $4.

Mr. PAYNE. Three dollars and seventy-five cents.

Mr. CANNON. The compromise was at $3.75. The report of the Tariff Board shows that if you want to make up the difference between the cost of production of print paper as between Canada and the United States, the duty ought to be $5.50.

Mr. MALBY. Five dollars and thirty-five cents.

Mr. CANNON. Five dollars and thirty-five cents a ton, to be accurate. Now, my friends, you say you are for a revenue duty. You hunger and thirst for revenue. A protective duty would be $5.35. Two dollars would give you revenue. Well, I am going to vote for $2, because it is better than nothing, and would give us revenue, which we will sadly need if you remain much longer in partial power in the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I think that is all the time I want to take. Looking at this side of the House, it seems to me that gentlemen who voted to validate this agreement could follow the example and the counsel of the former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE], and I am not sure but in a short time the future chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE]. [Applause on the Republican side.] I need not say that those with whom I agreed, who voted against this legislation, will, I believe to a man, vote for its repeal.

But the gentleman from Alabama says that the President will not sign this bill if this repeal of the Canadian reciprocity act is incorporated in it. I wonder when my friend became the spokesman for the President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the President of the United States asked me to pass the Canadian reciprocity pact. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Have you had the word that he will not sign this bill if it contains this provision?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I have.

Mr. CANNON. Do you say to me that if this Senate amendment goes upon this bill, on that account he will not sign it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to go into personal——

Mr. CANNON. I want to know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me to answer——

Mr. CANNON. The reason I want to know is that gentlemen about me claim that the gentleman from Alabama has stated in substance that if this bill passed without this amendment of the Senate the gentleman had assurances that the President would approve it, and that if this amendment placed on it by the Senate was agreed to the President would therefore veto it. I want to know if the gentleman has the authority to say that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know that the President of the United States has not changed his position, and knowing that, personally I am satisfied that he will veto this bill if you put this provision on it.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman want the House and the country to believe and understand that he knows that such would be the action of the President?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have stated to the gentleman that I know that the President, both by his public utterances and private utterances, has not changed his position on the Canadian reciprocity act. I take it that the gentleman who is President of the United States is not going to sign a bill to repeal a law when he is against that repeal, and that if he was for it he would say so to the House.

Mr. CANNON. That is argument, that is deduction, which the gentleman makes. The gentleman gave the impression to some of us that if this Senate amendment was defeated and this bill was sent to the President without the Senate amendment the President would approve it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not want to give the impression; I wanted to state it as a fact. It is a fact, and nobody can deny it. I challenge the gentleman from Illinois to deny the proposition or say himself that he believes the President of the United States will sign this bill if you put this amendment on it. I challenge the gentleman to say it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like a little more time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. So far as I am concerned, if this amendment is agreed to, I will vote against it whatever becomes of the bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] It will not become a law by my vote with this amendment on it or without this amendment on it, but I am in favor of this amendment. I am in favor of the repeal of the law validating the so-called Canadian reciprocity act at any and all times.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand that if this amendment is defeated the President of the United States will approve this bill?

Mr. CANNON. That is what I have been trying to get from the gentleman from Alabama by a direct question, as he professes to speak for the President of the United States. Has the gentleman assurance that the President of the United States will approve this bill if it is sent to him without the third amendment of the Senate, which provides for the repeal of Canadian reciprocity?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that I can not answer that question. The President of the United States, though, has had this matter investigated by one of his departments and has referred the investigation to the Ways and Means Committee. We have legislated with that information before us, and I assume that as he promised the American people that he would revise the tariff downward, he will take advantage of the opportunity and sign this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. At last the gentleman is delivered, but it took the force of a corkscrew to get it out of him. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I have but a few minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will get the gentleman additional time.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to know if the gentleman from Illinois or any other Republican can speak for the President and say what he will do?

Mr. CANNON. I can not as one Republican speak, but as God gives me power to see the right I will perform my duty and let the President perform his duty. [Applause on the Republican side.] The assumption as to what the President would do was on that side and not on this. I do not know. I am not advised. I think that everybody understands these popgun tariff bills that were passed during the special session and were vetoed by the President when they went to him, save alone the Canadian reciprocity act. They will understand also the bill that you are passing to-day with a hop, skip, and a jump, without much knowledge, and the little knowledge you have you ignore.

Now, for one I am perfectly willing—as one individual and one Republican—to go to the country during the coming campaign, standing by the Republican doctrine of protection as I have stood by it in the years that are passed and gone. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe in it as a policy. I am for it, and, as I shall answer at the last day, I had rather go down to defeat being responsible for that policy than to apologize and run in the light of the attack of the enemy who puts up to us in broken doses, frequently repeated, the proposition to write on the statute books your policy, which is not for the benefit, in my judgment, of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, there is not an intelligent man in this House or in this Capitol who does not know—yes, absolutely know—that this reciprocity amendment was put on the iron and steel schedule bill for the express purpose of killing it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not the time. I decline to yield unless I can have my time extended.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, let me have 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin for a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he does not know that the mover in the Senate of this amendment voted for the Democratic bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know and I do not care, but I assert to the House and the country that that amendment was voted on by the stand-pat protectionists in the Senate for the express purpose of giving the President an excuse to veto the bill revising the iron and steel schedule downward. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They do not and will not deny it. Immediately after its passage in the Senate the Republican press heralded it as a triumph of the Republican regulars and a defeat of the bill, declaring that the President could sign no bill containing an amendment repealing reciprocity, the one pet accomplishment of the administration. The Washington Post, the organ of the Taft administration, the organ of the standpatters in the Senate and in the House, the very next day after this reciprocity amendment was put on, boasted to the country of the clever trick the stand-pat Republicans had played on the real friends of the revision bill in voting the reciprocity amendment into the bill in order to insure the defeat of the bill by making it easier for the President to veto it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me read it:

The standpatters—

of which the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the ex-Speaker of the House, who have preceded me in this debate, are types—

The standpatters hope thereby to tie the steel bill up in conference and let it remain there until the session ends. That was a part of the Republican program when the repeal of the Canadian reciprocity amendment was put into the bill as an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. One minute. Let me finish reading:

It is understood that the same amendment will be voted into every House tariff bill that reaches a final vote in the Senate, thereby giving the President a better reason than he otherwise might have for exercising the veto power with respect to these bills.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

And yet you gentlemen are getting up here in this House and trying to make a false issue out of reciprocity. Let no good Democrat who represents an agricultural district, or any honest insurgent who really wants to represent the farmers of the West, be deceived by any such program as this transparent standpat program, which is schemed not to repeal reciprocity, but to defeat in the interest of the Steel Trust any reduction of the iron and steel revision.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just for a question.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman understands that the reciprocity measure is the revenue measure; that a bill to repeal it must originate in the House or come from the Senate as an amendment to a revenue measure.

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. So that any man in the Senate in favor of repealing it would only get an opportunity to vote anywhere upon that question by moving it as an amendment in the Senate.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am talking about the purpose for which it was put on the bill and the effect of it. I know that revenue measures must originate in the House, and I admit that the gentleman from New York is intelligent enough to know it, too, but this amendment was put on not to affect revenue, not to repeal the reciprocity act, but to defeat the iron and steel schedule bill, which means an annual saving to the American people, and especially the American farmers, of more than $100,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And here are the Republicans, standpatters and progressives, under cover of the reciprocity repeal amendment, which they know can not secure the sanction of the President, combining together in the name of the farmer to prevent us from granting by this bill relief to him from the extortions of the Steel Trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. The standpatters do not want any reduction of the iron and steel schedule. They know that if this bill becomes a law the protection system will receive a deathblow; and they know, too, that under the present political conditions of the administration, if the iron and steel schedule bill could be put up to the President alone and without the reciprocity amendment, every instinct of manhood, every impulse of integrity, every sense of right would compel him to now sign it, and why? Mr. Speaker, we have had the most exciting, the most remarkable, the most unique, and the most bitter campaign between the ex-President and the President that has ever occurred between candidates in this country. The contest between Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt has thrown into mad turmoil the whole Republican Party—insurgents and standpatters. What has been one of the issues? Mr. Taft has accused Theodore Roosevelt of being the candidate of the Steel Trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He and his friends have produced the evidence.

Mr. Taft has been up and down the country denouncing as a criminal monopoly and trust the steel corporation, declaring time and again that this corporation, with its vast interests and influence, is fighting him because he has ordered prosecution against it for violating the antitrust act. He and his friends throughout the country have been denouncing the Steel Trust as corrupting the primaries and convention in the interest of Mr. Roosevelt, putting up the money for Roosevelt's campaign. They charge that Mr. Perkins, a leading director of the Steel Trust, is openly backing Roosevelt's candidacy with the money and influence of the steel corporation, that he is now in Chicago assisting in the Roosevelt management. With this situation confronting the President, with this attitude toward the Steel Trust made bare and unmistakable by his frequent utterances, we know and every Republican knows that if this iron and steel revision bill can be presented to Mr. Taft without the reciprocity amendment not an instinct of manhood would be left in him, not an instinct of justice to the American people would be left in him, not an instinct of truth would be left in him if he dared veto it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the reason the standpatters do not want this revision bill put up to him. They know that he must sign it if it reaches him, without amendment, so they manipulated in the Senate to tack on to it the amendment repealing reciprocity, as the standpat Republican press has boasted, for the purpose of insuring his veto of the iron and steel bill.

They know that President Taft could not sign any bill that contained the repeal of the reciprocity act. They know that he could not repudiate his own measure, the one measure above all others which a hundred times over he has proclaimed as the great act of his administration. It is his pet measure.

But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] says that the President has changed his opinion on reciprocity. When and where did he ever give utterance to such a change? Why has not the President revealed this change of opinion to some Republican in this House or Capitol, and why can not some Member here tell us that he has even intimated such a change to him? Why does he not send a message to us asking for its repeal? We know and you know that the President has not reversed his position, that he is as strong now for reciprocity as when he sent his first message to Congress urging it. In frequent interviews and in nearly every speech he has made since its passage, he has defended and commended it to the American people as the one great act of statesmanship of his administration. Even in the campaign with Roosevelt he defended it and showed and forced an admission from him that before presenting the measure to Congress he conferred with Roosevelt about it, that Roosevelt heartily indorsed it and advised him to go ahead and push it through. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, why do these insurgents insist on the amendment? Simply to play politics for Roosevelt. They know that the intelligent public believes that Mr. Taft's charge that the Steel Trust is behind Theodore Roosevelt's candidacy is true; that, through Perkins, the Steel Trust interests are financing it. They do not want this steel and iron schedule to go up to the President alone, because they know that he would sign it, and this would be some evidence that he was a friend of the people and an enemy of the trust. [Applause.] They want to put the reciprocity amendment in it, knowing President Taft can not sign the bill, can not sign any bill, however righteous, containing such an amendment, requiring him to repudiate his own administrative measure, and thereby force him to veto it, so they then can go up and down the country hallooing "Taft vetoed the iron and steel revision bill in the interest of the trust. He belongs to the Steel Trust as much as Roosevelt does." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just for a question; not for a speech.

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will not explain how he intends to get this bill to the President if you disagree to the Senate amendment after you have accepted the other two?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell you how we will get it to him. If he is in favor of repealing this reciprocity act let him send a message here and ask this Congress to repeal it, and we will consider it——

Mr. LENROOT. But the gentleman does not answer my question. How do you propose to get the metal bill to the President when you disagree to this amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. If you gentlemen will vote for this bill, which will save the American people—the American farmer—over $100,000,000 annually, which is now being wrung out of them by the Steel Trust, and stop insisting on an amendment which you know will kill it, and then go to the Senate and make your insurgent Senators vote the same way and stop trying to play politics between Roosevelt and Taft, we will send it up to him and he will sign it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And then if the President has undergone any change of opinion on reciprocity, let him send a message to Congress saying so and asking for its repeal. This House will then consider the question straight and square on its merits. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asked Mr. UNDERWOOD:

> Do you know he will not sign this bill with this reciprocity amendment in it?

I ask him, Do you know or do you believe that he will sign it with it in? You talk about the farmers. There is not an intelligent Republican farmer in the United States who does not know or will not know that the reciprocity amendment was put in for politics only, who does not know that President Taft is bound to veto the bill if it is sent to him with the reciprocity amendment in, who does not know that if you insist on this amendment you will lose both the revision bill and the amendment and the farmer will be deprived of over $100,000,000 relief annually. Why insist on the amendment going in the bill when it is admitted that the President will veto any bill with such an amendment in it? Why not do the right and just thing by the farmer and the people and eliminate the reciprocity amendment and send up to the President a bill which saves to them annually from the exactions of the Steel Trust over $100,000,000? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HILL. But, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Connecticut yield until some arrangement can be made as to time? I ask unanimous consent that further debate on this amendment be closed in 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I hope that the gentleman will not make the request at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that he promised to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] after the gentleman from Connecticut had finished.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I withdraw the request at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I would state, furthermore, I shall probably not use the entire 10 minutes and will yield the unused portion to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not yield the time.

Mr. HILL. Very well, then.

Mr. Speaker, I voted for Canadian reciprocity a year ago. I shall vote against its repeal now. I think I differed a year ago with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who has just spoken. He now very kindly advises me to follow the advice of the chairman of the then Ways and Means Committee. I will ask him if he followed it then?

Mr. CANNON. No. But the gentleman is right now and was wrong then.

Mr. HILL. Ah, I have heard of other people in this country who condemned as wrong everybody that did not agree with them. [Applause.] I followed the advice of my judgment and conscience——

Mr. CANNON. Then, God save you. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL (continuing). A year ago, and I am trying to follow it now. And the gentleman can take his medicine from whom he pleases.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact that times change and men change with the times, and it is their right to do that. I believed the Canadian reciprocity was right then and I believe it is right now, but whether it is or not this amendment ought not to be concurred in, and I am going to try to tell you why. Under the law as it stands to-day there is a controversy between this and other countries as to what is known as the favored-nation clause of our treaties. They are claiming admission of free print paper to the United States from Sweden and other countries as well as from Canada under the terms of section 2 of this bill. This proposition does not relieve the situation. I hold in my hand the amendment. This amendment ought not to be concurred in because of its uncertain meaning, but should go to a conference committee and be redrawn and made to state just exactly what it is intended to do and that it does not do now. It provides that print paper prescribed in section 2 of said act, shall be dutiable at $2 a ton

It simply covers the paper that is the product of Canada, and the same question that exists now as to what shall be the duty on the print paper coming from other countries in the world will exist after this is repealed.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield to a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Has not the question as to the favored-nation clause in this connection risen entirely by reason of the existence of the Canadian reciprocity law? And does not the question disappear with the disappearance of the reciprocity law?

Mr. HILL. Not at all. It simply aggravates that. We had a message from the President of the United States a few weeks ago in response to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Will not the question of the favored-nation clause disappear entirely if this amendment should be agreed to? In other words, would not this amendment clearly admit of paper valued at less than 4 cents a pound, the duty on some of which now is $7 a ton and $2 a ton, coming from any other place in the world?

Mr. HILL. Absolutely no; because it is limited to paper from Canada, described in section 2 of the reciprocity act. If I am wrong, I would like to have the gentleman state wherein.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose this $2 duty applied only to the paper mentioned in that act. We would charge a duty of $2 to Canada. And these other nations coming in would obtain the benefit of the favored-nation clause, would they not?

Mr. HILL. You are reducing it from $7 to $2 to the whole world by simply repealing the reciprocity act and leaving the full duties on pulp. I believe it ought to go to a conference committee and have a clear understanding of what it means. As it is now it is not intelligently drawn. The proviso says that from and after the passage of this act there shall be a duty of $2 per ton paid on the paper described in section 2 of said act. What is that paper? It is paper coming from unrestricted wood, the product of Canada, so that this amendment does not reduce the duty on paper to $2 a ton from the whole world unless under a treaty others claim the right of the favored nation. Then the question would come up, Would it be from unrestricted wood from other nations? There is a complication here that ought to be straightened out before this amendment is concurred in.

Now, one statement more, Mr. Speaker, and then I am done. I said that I voted a year ago for reciprocity with Canada, and I heard the arguments against it. Men here said they were in favor of the reciprocity of Blaine and McKinley, but they were not for the one-sided reciprocity that was advocated at that time. I want to read to this House in my time the reciprocity of James G. Blaine—a resolution which he sent, while Secretary of State, to the House of Representatives, to Mr. McKinley, and the passage of which he advocated. Here it is:

> And the President of the United States is hereby authorized, without further legislation, to declare the ports of the United States free and open to all products of any nation of the American Hemisphere upon which no export duties are imposed, whenever and so long as such nation shall admit to its ports, free of all national, provincial (State), municipal, and other taxes, flour, corn meal, and other breadstuffs; preserved meats, fish, vegetables, and fruits; cottonseed oil, rice, and other provisions, including all articles of food; lumber, furniture, and other articles of wood; agricultural implements, and machinery, mining and mechanical machinery; and structural iron, steel rails, locomotives, railway cars and supplies, street cars, refined petroleum, or such other products of the United States as may be agreed upon.

That was the reciprocity of James G. Blaine. That was the reciprocity of William McKinley. And when you people tell me that you are for the reciprocity of James G. Blaine and William McKinley, as against a restricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States alone, my advice to you is to go back to the record and read what those men stood for.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. HILL. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I listened to the gentleman and heard him read, I understood him to read "flour, corn meal, and other breadstuffs." Did the gentleman find there "wheat, corn, oats, and rye"? In the Canadian reciprocity I remember it put wheat, corn, oats, and rye on the free list, but kept a duty on flour and all manufactures of grain.

Mr. HILL. Oh, I know that. But what I want to call attention to is that it opened the ports of the United States to the products of the entire Western Hemisphere, including Canada.

Now, I am willing to admit that circumstances and conditions have changed since then, and probably I would not vote for the reciprocity of James G. Blaine and William McKinley to-day. I stand on the Chicago platform. I stand not only on the reciprocity resolution, but I stand on it as to revenue legislation from beginning to end. I voted for Canadian reciprocity in the full belief that it would do no harm to any man, and I was confirmed in it a few nights ago when I was told by the highest agricultural authority in this country that within the last five years prior to Canadian reciprocity agricultural products to the amount of $95,000,000 went from the United States to Canada, as against $12,000,000 coming from Canada to the United States. We are no children to yield to a nation of 7,000,000, our next-door neighbors, in anything. I stood for reciprocity then; I stand for it now, and I will stand for it whenever the issue is raised by the Republican Party. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed for 10 minutes, and then I may desire a little more time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if it be not inappropriate, I would like to consider the Senate amendment itself instead of something else. The Senate amendment, under consideration, first provides for the repeal of the reciprocity act, and then it contains this proviso:

> Provided, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be a duty of $2 per ton paid on the paper described in section 2 of said act—

Meaning the Canadian reciprocity act.

Mr. Speaker, the matter of the duty on paper has been the storm center around which has revolved much of the agitation and some of the legislation of the country during the last few years, and it seems to me that we should be careful and understand what is proposed when we vote upon the proposition.

The proposition in the Senate amendment now is that there shall be a duty of $2 per ton levied upon the "paper described" in the Canadian reciprocity act. What is the paper described in the Canadian reciprocity act? Section 2 of the reciprocity act provides that pulp wood and paper valued at not to exceed 4 cents per pound shall be admitted free on certain conditions. The language of the section is:

> Pulp of wood, mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news print paper and other paper and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States shall be admitted free of duty—on certain conditions.

I have read all of the description of the paper, so that the description of the paper involved in section 2 is paper valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, made from wood pulp or of which wood pulp is the component material of chief value. The words "being the product of Canada" may be considered a part of the description. That is the entire description.

The provision in the pending amendment, while it proposes to change the duty on paper, does not propose to change the existing duty, if the reciprocity act be repealed, on wood pulp or on paper board.

Now, what is the present duty on paper? Many gentlemen assume that paper coming from Canada comes in free of duty, and that this proposition is in the interest of the paper manufacturer, and that it will assist in the preservation of the industry in the United States by putting a duty of $2 a ton on paper that now comes in free, but the fact is that half of the paper imported from Canada now comes in free and the other half pays a duty of $5.75 a ton.

This Senate amendment would reduce the duty on paper now paying $5.75 a ton to $2 a ton, while it would levy a duty of $2 a ton on the paper that comes in free. Under the existing law paper or pulp which is made from pulp wood in Canada, where the pulp wood itself might be exported from Canada, comes in free. We usually refer to that as private land pulp wood, private land wood pulp, or private land paper. But half the paper that comes from Canada comes from pulp wood cut upon Crown land, which can not be exported to the United States, and hence that pays, under the Payne law, a duty of $3.75 a ton, the ordinary rate of duty, plus an additional retaliatory duty of $2 a ton because of the restriction, making a total of $5.75 a ton. Now, if the Canadian act be repealed the Payne law takes effect as to the duty on pulp wood and wood pulp. The rate of duty on ground wood pulp is $1.67 a ton when made from restricted wood, it is $3.33 a ton on unbleached sulphite made from restricted wood, and it is $5 a ton on bleached sulphite made from restricted wood. If this should pass we would be in the anomalous position that we would be charging $2 a ton on paper when we were charging $1.67 a ton on the ground wood from which it is made, or $3.33 a ton on the sulphite pulp from which it is made, making the rate of duty on the paper less than the rate of duty per ton on the material from which it is made.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman if any paper comes in from Canada under the reciprocity law except paper described in section 2 of said act?

Mr. MANN. That is all.

Mr. PAYNE. This places a duty of $2 a ton on the paper described in section 2 of that act.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the conditions in section 2 of the Canadian reciprocity act are not a part of the description of the paper. In section 2 of the act it describes certain paper; that is a complete description of it, and says, as the Payne law says, on certain conditions that paper may come in free. But the conditions are no part of the description of the paper. I have had experience enough to learn that in passing laws and construing them you must be very careful about the language you use. The conditions in the Canadian reciprocity act are no part of the description of the paper.

Mr. PAYNE. No paper comes in free under the law except that mentioned in section 2.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the Senate amendment about paper coming in free. It says that the paper described in section 2 of the act shall come in at the rate of duty of $2 a ton. Section 2 describes all paper under 4 cents a pound.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. I would like five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the proposition as to the favored-nation clause. There is doubt now as to whether the favored-nation clause can be invoked in favor of paper coming from Norway, Germany, or any other country outside of Canada. But our Government has taken the position so far, although that has not been confirmed by the courts or assumed as a policy of the State Department, that section 2 of the Canadian act, being a part of a reciprocity act, it would not extend the favored-nation clause to other nations of the world.

But what is this proposition? To repeal the reciprocity act, and to admit paper coming from Canada free of duty at $2 a ton. Does anyone contend, or will anyone contend, that we could pass an act directly putting a rate of $2 a ton on paper coming from Canada and not be held to give the same rate of duty on paper coming from any nation that had a favored-nation clause in its treaty? I went over that when I introduced the original bill on the subject. It is perfectly patent that if you repeal the Canadian reciprocity act and say that you will grant a duty of $2 a ton on paper coming from Canada, being the product of Canada, any nation that seeks to export paper to us under the favored-nation clause is entitled to the same rate of duty, it being the product of its own country.

Mr. HILL. And, if the gentleman will pardon me, they still retain a duty of $5 on pulp, the material out of which the $2 paper is made.

Mr. MANN. Now, what are the tariff rates on paper? The tariff rate without the retaliatory duty is $3.75 on print paper valued at not more than 2¼ cents a pound. It is $6 a ton on paper between that and 2½ cents a pound. It is $10 a ton on paper valued between 2½ and 4 cents a pound. But this Senate amendment would admit paper coming from anywhere in the world, from a nation that had a favored-nation clause, at $2 a ton, and if it should be agreed to and become a law there would not be enough left of the paper industry of the United States to make a grease spot on a clean floor. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not in favor of breaking down the industries of the country.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the high-price paper the gentleman refers to come within the description as papers made from mechanical or chemical wood pulp?

Mr. MANN. Under 4 cents a pound a large share of the paper is made from ground wood or sulphite or soda pulp. Much book paper is under 4 cents a pound and is made from soda wood pulp. We have great industries all around us making wood pulp—soda pulp—which would be driven out of business by this amendment; nor could they recoup themselves by importing the pulp, because the rate of $5 a ton has remained on soda pulp and $2 a ton on the paper made from it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's view of it is that the Senate amendment would apply only to Canadian paper, and that the favored-nation clause in our treaties would probably then apply to other nations if enforced?

Mr. MANN. My view is not that probably they would apply, but that certainly they would.

Mr. MONDELL. But that the amendment itself was intended only to cover the Canadian paper?

Mr. MANN. I will not say that that was what the amendment was intended to cover, because, without referring to what took place in the Senate, I learned in reading some of the various documents we have that it was intended to cover every country.

Mr. MONDELL. As a matter of fact, does not its language limit it to Canada?

Mr. MANN. I think the language of the Senate amendment would only apply the rate of $2 a ton to paper coming from Canada, but that the favored-nation clause in treaties would make it applicable to other nations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I notice in the debate in the Senate that the gentleman from Iowa who offered the amendment stated that the paper would come in at $2 a ton from all the world.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to advert to what took place in the Senate, but without referring to that there were several erroneous opinions that I have read relating to this in a document that we find at least on six days in the week.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman, that the paper from the world would come in at $2 a ton—that paper described in section 2 of the Canadian reciprocity act—and that is exactly in accordance with the bill introduced by the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. The bill I introduced, and the report which my committee made, provided for a rate of $2 a ton on news-print paper valued at not more than 2½ cents a pound, made from wood which was unrestricted in its exportations, and coming from a Province which levied no restrictions upon exportations of any pulp wood in that Province, and levying a rate of duty of $6 a ton on any paper where there were any restrictions.

Mr. PAYNE. That meant a duty of $2 a ton on all paper from all the world except where there were these restrictions in Canada.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If that had been enacted into law, as it ought to have been, and the Canadian people had taken the position which they have since taken, we would now be paying $6 a ton on every ton of paper that came from Canada. That was an offer of favors which was not accepted by the subsequent action of Canada.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Is the gentleman holding that the proper interpretation of this Senate amendment would leave out as a part of the description of the paper this language, in section 2 of the reciprocity act:

On the condition precedent that no export duty, etc.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I am holding that is not a part of the description of the paper at all.

Mr. COOPER. Would it not be possible to make a very reasonable interpretation to this effect, that the language of section 2 of the reciprocity act relating to "news-print paper and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the bulk or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents a pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States," as to which the language "on the condition precedent" is used, is paper of such description on which there is no export duty?

Mr. MANN. That is not the language of the law.

Mr. COOPER. That is, in my judgment, in effect the language of the law under a fair interpretation of it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean that that is the language of the law. The gentleman means he thinks that is what it means.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will also notice that the language of the law covers both paper board, chemical pulp and ground wood, while the language of the amendment refers only to paper.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman one question. Leave out all the phraseology, which is simply an amplification of the description, and make it as simple as possible: Do not the words "condition precedent" mean or are they not the equivalent of this expression, "On which there is no export duty"? In other words, would not section 2 of the reciprocity act in effect read in this way:

News-print paper valued at not more than 4 cents a pound, products of Canada, on which there is no export duty, imported directly into the United States, shall enter free of duty.

Mr. MANN. It would not make any difference; there is no duty on paper exported from any country in the world. Although I drew the language that is in the Canadian bill, I drew it carefully, and that is not part of the description of the paper, in my judgment.

Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this Senate amendment would be jumping out of the frying pan into the fire, so far as the paper industry of the United States is concerned. I have been in favor of obtaining for use in the United States the pulp wood of Canada and at the same time uphold the industry of paper making in the United States. I do not believe in destroying that industry here or transporting the paper-making industry from the United States to Canada. I am in favor of protecting all American industries. I believe that every dollar that is paid out in this country for the manufacturing of an article in this country is that much better for the country than to have the dollar paid in a foreign land for the manufacture there of goods brought here, and I stand upon that principle. [Applause on the Republican side.] There has been some conversation here as to whether the President would veto this bill if this amendment were in or if it were out. Mr. Speaker, I can not speak with authority from the President, but I feel that I know that the President will be true to the principles of the Republican Party, true to the principles of protection for American industries, and that, whether this amendment be in or out of the bill, the bill, if it goes to him, will receive speedy and unequivocal veto in the interest of American industries. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, a year ago I opposed the passage of the Canadian reciprocity agreement, and I am in favor to-day of repealing it by concurring in the Senate amendment, in line with the motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I opposed the reciprocity agreement a year ago because I believed the farmers of this country were not given equal consideration with those who had for sale the manufactured or finished product, and I believe so to-day. There are those who say to-day we need not have concern over the reciprocity agreement, because it is a dead letter. If it is dead, why not humor those of us who are opposed to it by permitting it to be repealed? On the other hand, there are those who oppose the repeal of the law because they hope that ultimately its terms may be approved by Canada. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to it because of the fact that it may ultimately be approved and ratified by Canada. Last fall it failed of ratification not upon the economic merits of the proposition as submitted to the Canadian people, but rather it failed of ratification from the standpoint of sentiment that was aroused in that country touching their nationality, touching their relationship to the mother country and their ultimate relationship to the United States. There is no doubt in my mind that the question that appealed so strongly to the people of Canada at that time has been largely removed. They consider the question of their loss of nationality as an illusion, and they are now concerned with the economic features of the problem. I have no doubt that the report that is constantly coming from Canada is true that sentiment in that country is turning in favor of the reciprocal agreement that was proposed by our country.

There are those who say that the responsibility must rest upon the President for the law in the first place. There are Democrats who would shirk their responsibility. Let me say that the responsibility for passing it through the House rested with them a year ago. The approval of the measure passed on the urgent advice of the President rests with him. That question is not involved here. We are to-day face to face with the proposition of whether or not we shall continue it upon the statute books or repeal it. The President will accept his responsibility whenever he may be called upon to do so, and let this House not avoid the responsibility that rests upon it now to say whether or not it will continue to hold out to Canada a reciprocal agreement that was offered and passed here a year ago, or whether we shall repeal it at this time and let future negotiations looking to reciprocal agreements be for future Congresses to consider. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this should be a very satisfactory situation to Republican Members in the House. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who was opposed to reciprocity with Canada, favors concurring in this amendment in order to prevent reciprocity. The gentleman from New York favors concurring in this amendment in order to make feasible reciprocity at some future time. It should not be difficult for gentlemen upon that side of the House, in one situation or the other, to find sufficient excuse, if they desire the defeat of this bill, to vote for this amendment. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin demonstrated the insincerity and hypocrisy of the Republicans upon the tariff question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On last Thursday the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] made aggressive speeches in favor of the continuance of the Tariff Board and the necessity of having reports of the Tariff Board, and following their recommendations in order to carry out the Republican platform of equalizing the difference between the cost of production here and in other countries, and yet the gentleman from Wisconsin moved to concur in the Senate amendment, which proposes to put a duty of $2 a ton upon print paper.

The gentleman from Wisconsin knows that the highest motion in point of privilege is the motion to concur with an amendment. The report of the Tariff Board indicated that $5.35 a ton was the differential in the cost of production of print paper here and in Canada. If he believed in the principles of the Republican platform, if he was sincere in his advocacy of the Tariff Board in order to ascertain the difference in the cost of production here and in other places, his motion would more properly have been to have concurred with an amendment placing a duty of $5.35 a ton upon print paper instead of $2 a ton upon print paper. But this action illustrates the accuracy of the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that this proposed action is to make easy the vetoing of this bill by the President. The President in his various veto messages of tariff bills passed by Democrats in Congress based his action upon the ground that he did not have sufficient information with which to determine whether any industry in the United States would be affected by the rates of duty proposed in those bills. He has information which demonstrates that from his standpoint this particular industry would be injured by a duty of $2 a ton on print paper. In his speech at Winona—that famous Winona speech, delivered in September, 1909—he said, speaking of paper:

An examination of the evidence—

Referring to the evidence collected by the special committee appointed by the House which unanimously recommended a duty of $2 a ton—

An examination of the evidence satisfied Mr. PAYNE—I believe it satisfied some of the Republican dissenters—that $2, unless some change was made in the Canadian restrictions upon the exports of wood to this country, was much too low, and that $4 was only a fair measure of the difference between the cost of production here and in Canada.

What more is needed to demonstrate that the purpose of this motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is not, as some pretend, to repeal this reciprocity pact and to place a proper duty upon print paper, but it is to make easy the veto of this bill by the President, because without going further than to assert that this duty would be insufficient to give that protection guaranteed by the Republican platform to this industry he would justify himself in vetoing it. How many Republicans upon that side of the House, with the opportunity now presented to them, propose to vote for a duty upon print paper, which, according to the Tariff Board and according to the statement of the President and according to the former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] is inadequate to furnish the protection guaranteed by the Republican platform. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reach an agreement about closing debate.

Mr. JACKSON. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand there are two gentlemen on the other side of the House who desire to be recognized for five minutes each, and two gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can I have about two minutes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That would make 22 minutes, if the gentleman desires to be recognized for two minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say to the gentleman that I would like to offer a preferential motion, and I desire time on it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman what his preferential motion is.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to offer it now, if the gentleman will permit, and have it read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is it simply offered for information or is it to be pending?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is offered for information, Mr. Speaker. I have the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman does not yield the floor for the purpose of allowing me to offer it, so it will have to be read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska offers a preferential motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, as follows:

After the word "that," in line 15, page 22, insert the following:

"Sections 2 and 3 of," strike out the proviso so that the amendments shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That sections 1 and 3 of the act entitled 'An act to permit reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes,' approved July 26, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now I will ask the gentleman from Nebraska if the purpose of his amendment is to repeal all the Canadian reciprocity pact except that relating to paper?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; except section 2. It repeals everything except section 2.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the House voting on the question. I am not for it, of course, but I am willing to consent that the amendment may be pending.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not make any difference to me. I am perfectly willing to offer it now.

The SPEAKER. The reason the Chair propounded the question was that there is sometimes much doubt as to whether an amendment was simply read or read and pending.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama consents, as the Chair understands, to the pendency of this amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to have five minutes, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] five, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] five, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] five minutes, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] five minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] two minutes.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have two minutes.

The SPEAKER. If the gentlemen from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] wants to modify his motion, well and good.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DE FOREST] wants two minutes. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] wants five minutes. That would add seven minutes, and I desire to reserve five minutes for myself, Mr. Speaker, in case I wish to use it, although probably I shall not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this proposition close in 34 minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I feel very much gratified that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has introduced into the RECORD the Washington Post as Democratic authority. That, Mr. Speaker, is about all that the gentleman from North Carolina said that has any substance to it. But the authority of the Washington Post, a newspaper owned by a man who has been a prominent Democrat all his life and who of late years has become an authority for the ultraprotectionists of the country, should be given considerable consideration.

It happens, Mr. Speaker, that I took some notice of something that the Washington Post published a few days after the quotation that the gentleman from North Carolina quoted. It is too long to introduce into the RECORD at this place, but I wish to call to the attention of the gentlemen present a few remarks the Washington Post made.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit me one moment?

Mr. JACKSON. I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not quote the Washington Post as a Democratic paper.

Mr. JACKSON. This editorial is entitled "Holy alliance on the tariff." Here is the way it begins:

The Senate, by a rare display of teamwork in handling the steel bill, ratifies the do-nothing tariff program as outlined by the Post several days ago.

* * * * * * *

The object of this "holy alliance" is the worthy one of a truce to tariff tinkering until the country has registered its verdict on what has already been done toward downward revision.

* * * * * * *

For the Senate Democrats to load down the steel bill with amendments known to be anathema to their colleagues in the House is playing it low down—another instance of the spear that knows no brother—still the "holy alliance" has claims to justification that the "unholy alliance" a year ago was a stranger to.

In other words, the "unholy alliance," according to this paper, was an alliance to secure lower duties for the people of the country, while the "holy alliance" between the Senate Democrats and the ultraprotectionists in the Senate is an alliance to stop any tariff legislation. And now come the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and admit that these amendments were put on in the Senate to stop tariff legislation.

They confined their remarks to the reciprocity clause, but it must be, Mr. Speaker, that these other amendments were put in for the same reason. It can not be true that the gentleman from Alabama, who is so free to fling his arrows at men for favoring industries in their own districts, would report a bill containing a duty of 8 per cent on pig iron, represented in his own district, and now admit that 6 per cent is entirely high enough, an admission that the duty contained in his bill was 33⅓ per cent higher than it ought to have been; but when it is proposed to reduce that duty 25 per cent it is made a condition of that reduction that the manufacturers of pig iron in his own district receive a reduction of 5 cents per pound on ferromanganese, which they buy, or a reduction of 33⅓ per cent.

The ultraprotectionists of the Senate want no tariff revision because they want to retain the benefits of the Aldrich tariff law as long as they can. The Democrats of the Senate want no revision because they prefer to go before the country on the issue of the tariff as written in the present law. They are perfectly willing to allow the country to pay the present duties in order to secure better campaign issues. So it seems these interests have agreed to make it as easy as possible for the President to veto the bill.

It makes no difference what we do here, the die is cast and the bill is to go to the President imperfect and rank as possible, so he will be sure to veto it. The bill has been sent back here for us to fight out a sham battle over a dead issue, that of reciprocity.

If the Democrats of the Senate had wanted to pass a bill at this session, they would have joined the Progressive Republicans in the Senate in passing the Cummins amendments, similar to the course they pursued last summer on other bills, and there would have been some reasonable expectancy of the President's approval of the bill. And if he had failed to do so, we could have passed it over his veto. As it is, he is expected, even invited, to veto the bill. Having voted against reciprocity before, I shall do so again.

So I say that we are warranted in assuming that all of these amendments were put on in the Senate by the teamwork of the Democrats and the high protectionists. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ANSBERRY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by including this editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

"HOLY ALLIANCE" ON THE TARIFF.

The Senate, by a rare display of teamwork in handling the steel bill, ratifies the do-nothing tariff program as outlined by the Post several days ago. The only deviation from the Republican-Democratic agreement as forecast is the sending the bill back to the House instead of to the President in such a shape that a deadlock is inevitable, thereby sidestepping final action and a veto message. No hitch in the agreement having developed in disposing of steel, it is now admitted on both sides of the Senate that all the tariff measures will be "expedited" over the same route.

The object of this "holy alliance" is the worthy one of a truce to tariff tinkering until the country has registered its verdict on what has already been done toward downward revision. This arrangement is a decided gain for the cause of protection to American industry and a great boon to the business world, lifting, as it does, the major proposition to the incubus which frenzied politics puts on finance and trade. Although the Democrats promise to renew the fight for legislation next winter, the short session will scarcely suffice to carry out their purpose, thus making it practically certain that the tariff issue, except as a campaign slogan, will not again darken the prospect for a year and a half to come. Of course the protection party stands ready to revise the schedules along the lines indicated by President Taft, and if the revisionists modify their demands there is no reason why any inequalities may not be promptly legislated out; but nothing radical.

Oddly the Canadian reciprocity bill has been chosen as the instrument to block the House tariff program—to strangle the bills of which the rejected pact was regarded by the Democrats as the forerunner.

For the Senate Democrats to load down the steel bill with amendments known to be anathema to their colleagues in the House is playing it low down—another instance of the spear that knows no brother—still the "holy alliance" has claims to justification that the "unholy alliance" a year ago was a stranger to. As for the insurgents, they look to be deeper than ever in the hole they digged for Taft. Has the tariff ever failed to have its revenges, swift and sweet?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that what I shall say will probably not change a single vote on this amendment to repeal the act of Congress which approved the Canadian reciprocity treaty. The leaders on the Democratic side of this House have by their speeches indicated that there will be practically a solid Democratic vote against the repeal of this law. Nevertheless, I want to express my sentiments on the proposition. I voted against the Canadian reciprocity in the Sixty-first Congress. Again I voted against it in the Sixty-second Congress. I not only voted against the measure, but my voice was heard against the proposition. I am still against it and shall vote to repeal it. The Senate has passed this amendment, and if this House will concur in the action of the Senate it will no doubt be many years, at least, before the matter will be revived. But as long as this law stands on our national statutes Canada may at any time approve the measure, and the treaty would then go into effect. I am satisfied that if this measure was submitted to a vote of the American people to-day it would be defeated by an overwhelming majority.

If this measure is not repealed at this time the responsibility will rest with the Democratic majority in this House. The Republican Senate has voted to repeal the measure. A Democratic House will soon pass on the question. If the motion to concur in the action of the Senate shall fail to prevail, from this time on the Canadian reciprocity pact and the provisions therein contained become a Democratic policy.

Nearly 50 per cent of all the people in the United States reside on our farms. Agriculture is the one great fundamental industry of this country. We have 6,300,000 farmers in the United States. These men believe that the proposed Canadian reciprocity would work to their injury. In this they are correct. The policy of our National Government should be to aid, encourage, and promote agriculture in every possible way. It is not for the farmers alone that I speak. I feel that when I stand by the great industry of agriculture I am acting for the welfare of the entire country and in the interest of all the 92,000,000 people of the United States. If agriculture declines all other industries will suffer. When agriculture prospers every other industry will reap advantages. I supposed the so-called Canadian reciprocity treaty was dead. But the action of the Democratic side of this House in opposing its repeal puts the farmers of this country on their guard. The great majority of our farmers were opposed to this measure, they are opposed to it to-day, and will continue to be opposed to it. They, in my judgment, will continue to fight this measure until there shall be elected to the House of Representatives of the United States a membership that will see that this law shall be repealed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, there is very little to this proposition except that it gives great concern to our friends on the other side and is gradually bringing the Republicans together. It would please the gentlemen over there, I think, if this bill should so pass that a Republican President has to veto it. The wish is father to the thought. You have the responsibility of governing. It is up to you to raise the revenue, and you do not know how to do it. You do not want the revenue cut down, so you will pass this bill in order that a Republican President may veto it. The Republicans are coming together on this reciprocity question. Grant that a mistake of policy was made, a majority of the Republicans of this House voted against Canadian reciprocity.

It meant a closer alliance with Great Britain on free-trade lines, and you took it up as a Democratic measure. A majority of the Republicans of the House, believing reciprocity would affect the industries of the United States, voted against it. The Republican vote was 65 for reciprocity and 80 against reciprocity. The Democratic vote was 203 for reciprocity and 9 against it. So that if it injures the farmer you were more responsible for it than we were. A majority of the Republicans of the Senate also voted against reciprocity with Canada and the British trade entanglements that would necessarily follow. The Republican vote in the Senate was 20 for reciprocity and 24 against. Of the Democratic Senators, 33 voted for reciprocity and only 3 against. Now, if Canada has repudiated reciprocity, and it is seen that a mistake was made upon this side of the border, we are correcting it. The farmer and the industrialist, whom you attempted to separate on the reciprocity issue, are now coming together where they rightfully belong, under the banner of protection. The farmer is beginning to understand your pretenses and the burdens you would impose upon him, and will be pleased to have us recall an unfair agreement with Canada that would tend to prevent the workmen of the United States from earning an American wage in American mills. As the Representative of a city district I voted against this Canadian reciprocity agreement, because I believed we should give to the farmer the same measure of protection that we give to the man that works in the mills. You would take that protection from him. [Applause on the Republican side.] The farmer and the mill worker evidently understand the situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has stated that the Republicans are getting together on this question of reciprocity. I noticed that on the 25th of April last the President of the United States in his speech at Columbus, Ohio, proceeded in his usual way to defend his course with respect to reciprocity, and he stated in that speech that he believed he was right on that question during the last year, and that he believes he is right upon it now.

Up at Boston a few days prior to that time the President proceeded to make a similar defense, both of his past and present position, on this question. There are but two leading candidates for President in the gentleman's party at this time. During the pendency of the Canadian reciprocity in the House and Senate another of their leading candidates for President, Mr. Roosevelt, through the columns of the Outlook, a magazine published in the city of New York, which has a wide circulation in this country, proceeded in editorial after editorial to give his hearty approval to the doctrine of reciprocity as embodied in the bill which passed Congress and was signed by the President. After that time this same gentleman in a speech before the Republican Club of New York, and in another speech on another occasion after reciprocity had passed Congress and became a law, proceeded to give it his further indorsement and to enter into an elaborate argument giving the reasons why the President of the United States and Congress were eminently correct in the position they had taken.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not a swollen combination, there is not a trust, there is not any aggregation in the nature of a monopoly, deriving its existence from our protective policy that is not heartily in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I did not hear the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and I will not speak as to that. But this is another step in the progress of our friends who have stood here and by one device and subterfuge after another have prevented an honest reduction of taxation in this country.

The prime minister of Canada a few days ago in a speech gave the reasons for the temporary defeat of reciprocity in Canade. Here is his language:

> Moreover, it is an open secret to us, so open that everybody knows it, that during the last election, in the heat of the contest, when every nerve was straining to win the fight, the special interests of the United States joined hands with the special interests in Canada to defeat reciprocity, both by singing lustily and loudly "God save the King," but also murmuring to themselves, "God save our monopolies and our trusts."

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give way for a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MALBY. Does the gentleman mean to say that the speech from which he quoted just now was a speech of Premier Borden?

Mr. HULL. I quoted from a speech of the former prime minister of Canada, Mr. Laurier, who headed the movement for reciprocity.

Mr. MALBY. But I believe his party was defeated.

Mr. HULL. His party was temporarily defeated, but is rapidly regaining its lost ground.

Mr. MALBY. He is not the present premier of Canada?

Mr. HULL. Not the present premier.

Mr. WARBURTON. How does the gentleman know that the former minister is rapidly regaining his lost ground?

Mr. HULL. I know from the election returns as published in the press of the country.

Mr. WARBURTON. What election returns?

Mr. HULL. Oh, I can not stop to be catechized upon a minor matter.

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman can not show any such election returns.

Mr. HULL. I was proceeding to say, Mr. Speaker, that this reciprocity movement marks the first breach in the wall of protection at the hands of a Republican administration, and I am not surprised that every trust——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the speeches of ex-President Roosevelt and President Taft with respect to reciprocity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the matter I refer to is as follows:

President Taft, speaking at Springfield, Ohio, May 19, 1912, said:

Let me show you what Theodore Roosevelt's attitude was in regard to the reciprocity agreement. I wrote to him about it and gave him the arguments pro and con, and he agreed with me and commended me highly, and said he hoped it would go through. Afterwards he made two speeches in favor of it. Then he went to Illinois after the agreement had been beaten and after the Canadians had said, "This is too good a contract for the United States and therefore not good enough for us," and had voted it down.

Mr. Roosevelt found that it was working against me with the farmers and he said: "I was in favor of this, but I made a mistake. I made a mistake because "—now, mark me, and God save the mark—"because I wanted to help Taft's administration."

And now he says, "Now I see the error of my ways; I see the mistake I made. I see that it was directed against the farmers and did not give them a square deal and so I will take it all back."

Now, my friends, is that a square deal to me? I believe I was right. I would not change my opinion when I have that belief. I am conscientious in it. I have told you why I believed it was in the interest of all of us, and though I lose votes of the farmers and though I lose an office.

Ex-President Roosevelt is reported in the press to have spoken as follows at Grand Rapids, Mich., on February 12, 1911:

Here, friends in Michigan, right on the northern frontier, I have the peculiar right to say a word of congratulation to you and to all of us upon the likelihood that we shall soon have closer reciprocal tariff and trade relations with the great nation to the north of us. And I feel so pleased primarily because I wish to see the two peoples—the Canadian and the American peoples—drawn together by the closest ties on a footing of complete equality of interest and mutual respect. I feel that it should be one of the cardinal policies of this Republic to establish the very closest relations of good will and friendship with the Dominion of Canada.

Later, in a speech before the Republican Club of New York, ex-President Roosevelt spoke as follows:

I want to say how glad I am at the way in which the members of the club here to-night responded to the two appeals made to them to uphold the hands of President Taft, both in his effort to secure reciprocity with Canada and his effort to secure the fortification of the Panama Canal. And in addition to what has been said about reciprocity with Canada, I would like to make this point: It should always be a cardinal point in our foreign policy to establish the closest and most friendly relations of equal respect and advantage with our great neighbor on the north. And I hail the reciprocity arrangement because it represents an effort to bring about a closer, a more intimate, a more friendly relationship of mutual advantage on equal terms between Canada and the United States.

In his Boston speech, on April 25 last, President Taft spoke as follows:

CHANGE OF FRONT ON RECIPROCITY.

Fourth. Mr. Roosevelt now seeks to take advantage of the supposed feeling among the farmers of the country against the reciprocity agreement with Canada which I made and induced Congress to adopt, but which Canada finally rejected. I would not object to this as a legitimate argument in a political controversy against me and in his favor if the fact were not that I consulted him 10 days before I made the agreement, explained to him in full its probable terms, stated the arguments pro and con, especially the effect of it on agricultural products, and asked him to confer with his colleagues of the Outlook as to its wisdom and public benefit and let me know his and their judgment. He replied approving the agreement in the most enthusiastic terms and complimenting me for having brought it forward.

I submit below our correspondence on the subject of reciprocity:

[Confidential.]

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 10, 1911.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
The Outlook, New York.

MY DEAR THEODORE: Just at present I am in the midst of reciprocity matters, and it would gratify me a great deal to talk over with you this issue. I have, as you have known, always been a low tariff and downward revision man, and the reason why I favored the last tariff bill and praised it as the best one we had ever had was: That the consideration of it on its passage and the efforts of those who defended it afterwards to show that it was a downward revision were all a concession by the Republican Party that downward revision was necessary, and that the rule upheld by Shaw and CANNON and other standpatters of the orthodox type that no tariff could be too high, because what you needed was a Chinese wall, had been departed from. Now, the probability is that we shall reach an agreement with our Canadian friends by which all natural products—cereals, lumber, dairy products, fruits, meats and cattle—shall enter both countries free, and that we shall get a revision—not as heavy a one as I would like, but a substantial one, and equivalent certainly to the French reciprocity treaty and probably more—on manufactures.

The truth is that the minute that we adopt in convention the proposal that our tariff should be measured by the difference in the cost of production we necessarily adopt a rule which would lead us straight to reciprocity in natural products with Canada, because the conditions in the two countries are so similar that there is substantially no difference in the cost of production. Possibly labor is slightly lower in some parts of Canada than in the United States, but it is also higher in some parts, and the adoption of free trade would rapidly increase the cost of labor in those parts where it is cheaper in Canada, so that the conditions would be the same.

MIGHT REDUCE FOOD PRICES.

It might at first have a tendency to reduce the cost of food products somewhat; it would certainly make the reservoir much greater and prevent fluctuations. Meantime the amount of Canadian products we would take would produce a current of business between western Canada and the United States that would make Canada only an adjunct of the United States. It would transfer all their important business to Chicago and New York, with their bank credits and everything else, and it would increase greatly the demand of Canada for our manufactures. I see this is an argument against reciprocity, made in Canada, and I think it is a good one.

The proposition is to make an arrangement by which we shall present to both Houses of Congress an identical bill, and pass it as an agreement for joint legislation. In this way we would avoid the necessity for two-thirds in the Senate, and would secure at once the consent of the House, which in tariff matters is generally regarded as necessary, at any rate. This will cause a great commotion, I presume. It will be unpopular in New York because of certain lumber manufacturing interests and the dairy interests. It will be unpopular in Minnesota because of wheat; but on the other hand, free lumber will be popular in some places, and as it includes free paper and free wood pulp we may count on the fairly good support of the press.

CONFIDENTIAL.

This letter, of course, I must ask you to regard as confidential, though I would be glad to have you discuss with your colleagues on the Outlook such a proposition, and should be glad to hear from you as to your judgment of it. I think it may break the Republican Party for a while. As Elihu Root said, when I talked with him yesterday, it may be an entering wedge against protection, although it is not inconsistent with the principle of protection as we laid it down in Chicago. Of course it will be said against it that we are taking agriculture and making it suffer first before we tackle wool and cotton. The bill is not likely to pass the present Congress, and before the new Congress comes together I think I shall be able to make some recommendations as to the wool and cotton schedules and present a problem to the Democrats which they are not likely to find an easy one. At least it will show the hyprocrisy of some people. Of course this is no ground whatever for introducing and pressing such a measure. I believe it to be right, and if it leads, on the other hand, to a reduction in wool and cotton manufactures to the lowest figures and to what is a real measure of the difference in the cost of production, so much the better.

I shall be glad to hear from you as soon as you conveniently can write on this subject, because the matter is just at hand, and it is quite likely that within 10 days we shall reach an agreement.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

ROOSEVELT FIRMLY BELIEVED IN FREE TRADE WITH CANADA.

OFFICE OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
THE OUTLOOK, No. 287 FOURTH AVENUE,
New York, January 12, 1911.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I at once took in your letter and went over it with the Outlook editors. * * *

It seems to me that what you propose to do with Canada is admirable from every standpoint. I firmly believe in free trade with Canada for both economic and political reasons. As you say, labor cost is substantially the same in the two countries, so that you are amply justified by the platform. Whether Canada will accept such reciprocity I do not know, but it is greatly to your credit to make the effort. It may damage the Republican Party for a while, but it will surely benefit the party in the end, especially if you tackle wool, cotton, etc., as you propose.

Ever yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

After the reciprocity agreement was published Mr. Roosevelt delivered two public addresses in which he expressed his warm commendation of the agreement and a hope that it might be adopted. Now, in the exigency of his contest for the nomination, and with the purpose of accentuating the supposed feeling of the farmers against me, he recants his approval of the agreement on the ground that it would not have been a square deal for the farmers, a circumstance which, he intimates, escaped him when he, in a desire to support my administration, had approved the agreement. I submit that Mr. Roosevelt's course on reciprocity is not in accord with the square deal.

[Mr. MONDELL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian reciprocity bill, so-called, contained three sections. Section 2 was confined entirely to the paper and pulp proposition, and is the only part of the Canadian reciprocy bill that went into effect. It was the only part that could go into effect without the consent of Canada, and hence section 2 is the only part of the reciprocity bill that is now alive and in effect and operation.

The preferential motion which I have offered, if agreed to, will keep section 2 on the statute books just as it is now. It will repeal the balance of the Canadian reciprocity bill. Every argument that has been made on either side of this House in this discussion, dependent for its force or its logic upon the actual operation, making objections to the approval of the Senate amendment in toto, falls to the ground, if you will take into consideration the motion I have made and the opportunity it will give you to vote for this preferential motion. It will, in other words, repeal that part of the Canadian reciprocity act that is of no legal effect at the present time and can not be until Canada acts. It will leave on the statute books the law that you gentlemen passed, hence you should have no objection at least to that part of it.

So that it seems to me, from the standpoint of the men who have been arguing against the so-called Lenroot amendment, your very logic will lead you to vote for the particular motion which I have offered. My motion will have the effect of repealing Canadian reciprocity, but it will give us free print paper, free wood pulp, and free pulp wood. It will give effect to the only good part of the law and repeal all of the balance. It will relieve the newspapers from the domination of the Paper Trust and relieve the American farmer from the dangers of the obnoxious Canadian reciprocity. We ought to have free pulp wood and free wood pulp and free print paper for two reasons: First, to strike a blow at the American Paper Trust, and, second, to conserve the wood of our own forests that is fit for paper making. Our paper wood is fast disappearing, and we will soon be at the mercy of foreign importers if we do not conserve our own forests. We should admit all wood and all lumber free. Every time we bring in lumber or wood from a foreign country we save just so much of our own forests. I voted against Canadian reciprocity when it was passed and I will vote to repeal it now. My motion will do this. It is true it is not operative now, but it is on the statute book, and at any time Canada may accept it, and then it will at once be in operation in all its evil and iniquity. We have an opportunity to relieve the American farmer from any danger of its future operation, and we ought to do it and do it now.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said as to what position the President of the United States will take, or who is responsible for Canadian reciprocity, and who is behind it now. As far as I am concerned, I believe that each individual ought to vote his conscientious convictions upon this proposition. I know there are many men who are in favor of it who conscientiously believe in it. I am not criticizing them. They have a right to their opinions the same as those of us who oppose it have to ours, and I am not questioning any man's motive, no matter which side of this question he may be on. But I do question the assertions of men here who have said several times in the course of this debate that men who are in favor of agreeing to the Senate amendment or who are in favor of doing anything contrary to the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are not sincere and are not acting in good faith. If the President wants to veto this bill, whether this amendment is on or off, he has the right to do it, and as far as I am concerned, whether it is on or off, if he vetoes it I am ready to pass it over his veto, if the opportunity is presented. I am just as earnest and just as honest in my conviction that reciprocity is a snare, is a fraud, and an injustice to the great American people as are the men who think it ought to be and will become eventually the salvation of all our people. Suppose this amendment is voted down. Suppose the motion of the gentleman from Alabama prevails, and this bill goes to the President without that amendment. Is there any man here who can assure us on the part of the President that he will approve it? If there is he ought to speak, and he ought to let us know he would approve without this amendment and that he would disapprove the bill with it. Let us do our duty now as we see it and let the President act on his own responsibility and be responsible for his own acts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, when the reciprocity measure was considered in the House in the Sixty-first Congress I voted against it. In the special session of this, the Sixty-second Congress, I not only voted against it, but opposed it in debate, and I shall vote to-day for the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, to concur in the amendment of the Senate to the metal bill for its repeal. I shall continue to vote for the repeal of Canadian reciprocity not only to-day, but whenever I can get an opportunity, and if this Congress refuses to repeal it, I venture the prediction that the American farmer will see to it that the next Congress is so constituted that it will.

I am opposed to the so-called Canadian reciprocity because it is un-Republican and because it is a discrimination against the farmers and the agricultural interests of the country. I have the honor to represent a Republican State, and a State that believes in the principles of the Republican Party and the doctrine of protection. In 1908 South Dakota returned a Republican majority for the Republican candidate for the Presidency of over 27,000; in the election of 1910, and after the passage of the Payne tariff law, we increased our Republican majority over 1908 by about 5,000; and no better evidence can be had of our position toward supporting the Republican Party and protection than the vote of 1910. We do not expect to only have protection for the things that we produce, but we are, and have been, willing to give and take, and so long as we are permitted to enjoy the benefits of protection we are willing that you in the East and in other parts of the country shall also have your industries protected; but, Mr. Speaker, as I stated on this floor in April, 1911, in opposing the passage of the reciprocity measure, if you Republicans in the East think that you can put everything that we of the West produce on the free list and that we will continue to permit you to have protected your manufactured interests you will find you are mistaken, and it is only a matter of time when the Republicans of the West, as some have already done, will retaliate, and if it is going to be free trade on our products it will be free trade on what you manufacture. I believe most of you now acknowledge that you were in error in voting as you did for Canadian reciprocity and that you will welcome this opportunity to vote for its repeal, and I appeal to you to do so and let us once more get together and stand shoulder to shoulder as we did for so many years in upholding the principle of protection, recognizing that if we would succeed that we must be fair and treat every industry and every part of the country alike, and if we will only do this I make the prediction that in the coming campaign, with an issue of free trade or tariff for revenue only by our Democratic opponents, that we will not only succeed in the election of a Republican President, but we will again obtain control of this House. We can not hope to win so long as one part of the country is demanding protection for what it produces and free trade upon what it consumes. We of the West will stand with you of the East, but we shall demand a square deal and fair treatment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am hungry to hear coming from that side of this House a genuine appeal in the interest of the common masses of the common people of this country. I am tired of hearing gentlemen over there talk so much about protecting industries when the head of the industry has already gathered in his hundreds of millions of dollars—dollars that you have wrung from the pockets of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said here to-day that we would allow goods to come in from foreign countries encouraging the laborer there and injuring the laborer here. I wish that the gentleman could have heard the testimony before the Rules Committee when little children came here from Lawrence, Mass., telling of poor wages and want among the workers there. Men testified that their condition was better in Europe than here under your high-protective tariff system. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but some of them said that they fared better even under conditions in Europe than here under this awful tariff system, and that they would like to go back to Europe. They said that they had been deceived by these captains of industry, who had pictures of the laboring man in America carrying his money to the bank and depositing it there, and they said when they came they found that they had been deceived; that nothing they saw justified such a picture..

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield, as my time is limited. You deceived them and brought them here and reduced them to such a state of poverty that they are unable to go back to Europe, where they came from. [Applause on Democratic side.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the ex-Speaker of this House, accused this side of demagoguery. "You are playing politics," he said. That has been the story from the foundation of the world. Whenever a man dared to stand up and fight privilege and oppression in the name of those in the common walks of life, who had but little influence with the powers that be, he was accused of being a demagogue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It was the maxim of the tyrants of old that the people must be kept in ignorance. Thank God, more than a hundred years ago a man came into this world who said, "Preach a crusade against ignorance," and that man was Thomas Jefferson, the father of the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have been preaching that crusade against ignorance. The people of the United States are being educated on the awful evils of high protection. I can prove to any farmer in the United States now that every time you give him a dollar through your high protective tariff system you take $5 out of his pocket through the same system in what he has to buy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman yields me two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. If he has five minutes remaining he can yield two.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has five minutes he can use the time if he wishes, but he can not yield to anyone else. [Cries of "Vote!"] The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to concur with an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Is not the motion to amend the motion to concur?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman's motion is to concur with an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my motion may be again reported by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the motion.

There was no objection.

The motion was again reported.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division; there are two propositions. One is to concur, and an amendment is offered. Now, there are two propositions——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to concur with an amendment is not divisible.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a motion simply to concur is a preferential motion, and my motion to concur and amend is a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. Oh, there is no doubt about the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska being preferential.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; but the gentleman's proposition to divide it simply makes it the other motion to concur.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The point of order I make is that a motion to concur with an amendment is not divisible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that view of this matter is correct.

Mr. CANNON. There are two separate propositions, and you can strike out either proposition——

The SPEAKER. No; the proposition is to concur with an amendment, which is the first proposition to be voted on.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the Chair this is the parliamentary situation. I have not the precedents in hand, but I am satisfied there are precedents to sustain the position I take. A motion comes up to concur. Now, the gentleman makes the motion to concur with an amendment. If you divide that question, why then you do not bring up before the House the distinctive question of concurring with the amendment, and it is one motion and it is not divisible.

The SPEAKER. Why, the Chair fully agrees with the gentleman from Alabama about it. The feature of the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska that makes his motion preferential, and also the other motion, is the feature of concurring with an amendment. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska to concur with an amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 57, nays 189, answered "present" 7, not voting 138, as follows:

Until June 12:

Mr. REDFIELD with Mr. AINEY.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT. I wish to withdraw my vote of "nay." I do not know how he would have voted had he been present.

The name of the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. FORDNEY, was called and he voted "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A negative vote on a motion to concur is equivalent to a motion to disagree, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is to concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 101, nays 145, answered "present" 5, not voting 140, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. LENROOT to concur in the Senate amendment was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. WICKLIFFE with Mr. HANNA.
Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. PORTER.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. MCKENZIE.

On the vote:

Mr. BRANTLEY (against concurring) with Mr. GUERNSEY (in favor thereof).

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea." I wish to withdraw my vote and vote "present," because I was paired.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. FORDNEY, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the three Senate amendments were disposed of was laid on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a fourth amendment to the bill, changing the number of section 4. I ask unanimous consent to disagree to the fourth amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the action last taken was laid on the table.

MAINTENANCE OF INDIGENT PATIENTS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (H. DOC. NO. 825).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a communication from the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting a report by the auditor for the District of Columbia in relation to a charge of $769,536.09 which by the terms of the sundry civil bill as reported to the House of Representatives it is proposed to deduct from the revenues of the District of Columbia and reimburse to the United States on account of certain deficiencies in payments made by the District to the Government Hospital for the Insane.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 10, 1912.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3947. An act to provide for a bridge across Snake River in Jackson Hole, Wyo.;

S. 6918. An act increasing the cost of erecting a United States post-office building at Hillsboro, Tex.;

S. 6612. An act for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Tennessee; and

S. 6798. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permission for the erection of the Fort Huachuca Military Reservation in Arizona.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed a bill of the following title:

On June 10, 1912:

H. R. 23837. An act to authorize the Clinton & Oklahoma Western Railway Co. to construct and operate a railway through certain public lands, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 6918. An act increasing the cost of erecting a United States post-office building at Hillsboro, Tex.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 6612. An act for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Tennessee; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 6798. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permission for the erection of a hotel on the Fort Huachuca Military Reservation, in Arizona; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 3947. An act to provide for a bridge across Snake River, in Jackson Hole, Wyo.; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

JOHN C. SCHOLTZ, OF VENEZUELA (H. DOC. NO. 824).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit Mr. John C. Scholtz, a citizen of Venezuela, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point at the expense of the Government of Venezuela.

The Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of Venezuela and that it would follow established precedents.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 10, 1912.

CORRECTION IN AN ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a concurrent resolution for a correction made necessary by an error in a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution that the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 54.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13041) entitled "An act to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia," to insert on page 1, line 12, before the word "within" the word "or."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

SPEAKER FERRARA OF THE CUBAN CONGRESS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it affords me gratification to announce that we have with us to-day an eminent representative of our sister Republic of Cuba, the Hon. Orestes Ferrara, speaker of the Cuban Congress. In view of all the circumstances in connection with Cuba, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess for five minutes for the purpose of receiving and greeting this distinguished citizen of Cuba.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I said some time ago that I should object to requests of this sort hereafter, but I shall not object to this request, on account of the fact that the gentleman whom we seek to honor is the speaker of the Congress or legislative body of Cuba.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The House is in recess for five minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] will please bring forward and introduce the speaker of the Cuban House.

Mr. Ferrara was escorted to the Speaker's desk by Mr. SULZER.

During the recess the following occurred:

The SPEAKER. The Chair presents to the House of Representatives Mr. Speaker Ferrara, of the Congress of the Cuban Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRARA. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I can not express myself fluently in the English language. That is my fault, and it is not my only one.

I wish to express to the American Congress the greetings and salutations of the Cuban Congress and of the Cuban people, who will never forget the blood of American citizens which was shed on our hill of San Juan. [Applause.] Neither will they ever forget that the first declaration of the independence of Cuba was contained in a joint resolution of the American Congress. [Applause.]

At this moment we have a little trouble in Cuba, not very much, and I think the trouble is more in the columns of the press than in reality. Many stories coming from Cuba are exaggerated. [Applause.] The Cuban Government has already reduced this little insurrection or revolution—if that name can be given to the interruption of public order in Cuba—to a small territory in Guantanamo, near the naval station. It will not last much longer. The Cuban Government can finish alone, without any outside assistance, the work which it has begun. We Cubans hope there will be no intervention on the part of the United States. I want you gentlemen to remember the fact which you announced in that joint resolution 14 years ago, that Cuba is, and of right ought to be, free and independent. [Applause.] This is an act of simple justice, to which you are well accustomed, because justice and the United States are synonymous. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the honorable speaker of the Congress of Cuba be given leave to revise and extend his remarks for insertion in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The speech was made while the House was in recess.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings which occurred during the recess be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois amends the request of the gentleman from Kansas, and asks that the proceedings of the recess be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance of marine hospitals, including subsistence, and for all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $245,000: Provided, That there may be admitted into said hospitals for study persons with infectious or other diseases affecting the public health, and not to exceed 10 cases in any one hospital at one time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 23, after the word "time":

"And provided further, That all honorably discharged volunteer soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection who are afflicted with tuberculosis shall be admitted to the United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service Sanatorium at Fort Stanton, N. Mex., under regulations of the Surgeon General of the said service, and that the sum of $10,000 be appropriated for the cost of their subsistence and care."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that.

Mr. STONE. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will reserve it for five minutes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that this amendment is subject to a point of order, but inasmuch as other provisions also subject to a point of order have already been included in this bill, I thought that if this amendment was shown to be meritorious the point of order would not be insisted upon.

This amendment carries an appropriation of $10,000, but as a matter of fact it will not result in increased cost to the Government. At the present time the ex-volunteers of the War with Spain and of the Philippine insurrection are admitted to the United States homes for disabled volunteers, where they are usually compelled to go when disabled from tuberculosis or any other cause. These homes have no special facilities for the treatment of consumptives, and admission to Fort Stanton would be only in the nature of a substitute or transfer and at no greater cost to the Government. Under the present system the taint of the great white plague is carried by the afflicted soldiers into the homes for disabled volunteers and becomes a menace to their comrades. Every hygienic and humane consideration requires their immediate segregation in some such hospital as the one at Fort Stanton.

I submit that the protection to the public in the segregation of these unfortunates, the probable cure of the incipient cases, and the education of the patients in the matter of caring for themselves in the future would justify the expenditure of $10,000 by the Government both as a social and a sanitary measure, even if it were not true that the expenditure will be fully compensated for by the less amount required to maintain the homes.

The ex-regular soldier afflicted with tuberculosis is provided with a Government haven at Fort Bayard, N. Mex.; the United States sailor is sheltered in a national sanitorium at Las Animas, Colo.; but through some inexplicable omission the patriotic citizen who has served the colors as a volunteer, although stricken by consumption, is left to shift for himself.

Fort Stanton is selected and named in this amendment because at this institution 50 more patients can be accommodated without increasing the general equipment, and because it will not interfere with the plans for voluntary contributions, by which the institutions under the control of the War Department are largely supported.

Under the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, employees of American vessels of the merchant marine and of the Government marine establishments who have served as such during any part of the 60 days previous may be admitted to the Fort Stanton Sanitarium when found to be afflicted with tuberculosis. This being the case, I feel that the same privilege should be extended to those who served our country in time of war.

I trust that the gentleman from New York will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Spanish War veterans are entitled to be taken to the soldiers' homes. One of the best and most desirable sanitoriums for tuberculosis is at Battle Creek, which is maintained exclusively for such cases. The soldiers' home at Johnson City, Tenn., is practically converted into a home for soldiers affected with tuberculosis. There are ample facilities in these two institutions. What the gentleman from Illinois proposes now, without any opportunity for Members who must assume the responsibility for such action, is to permit the sending of persons employed in one service of the Government into the institutions provided for a different service and a different class of persons. Whether it is desirable to do that, whether the accommodations are sufficient, just what would be necessary in order to make it possible, is not disclosed, and it is not possible to determine. Under the circumstances there is nothing left for me to do but to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $1,656,745, which shall include the amount necessary for the medical inspection of aliens, as required by section 17 of the act of Congress approved February 20, 1907.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question for information. I have been trying to get a marine hospital established in one of the lake ports in my district, and, although the need seems to be very apparent, I have been met each time with the answer that the appropriations were insufficient, though there was a large demand for such appropriations and a very great need for additional facilities being extended to different towns which now have no such facilities. I wish to inquire whether this bill contemplates any material increase over what has existed in prior bills for this particular service of maintaining marine hospitals?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from New York is getting some information upon this subject perhaps I can give some information to the gentleman from Ohio. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is the committee which has legislative jurisdiction over the establishment of marine hospitals, and not the Committee on Appropriations. I was upon that committee for many years. There were at different times propositions before us for the establishment of new marine hospitals, and I think during my service we did establish one at Buffalo.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And one at Pittsburgh.

Mr. MANN. I think another was provided for at Pittsburgh. I do not know whether it has ever been established, but I am certain there is no need for it. We discovered after we had authorized, I think, one at Buffalo that so far from needing new hospitals in the main they had no use for some of those now in existence. A sailor can go into the Buffalo hospital just as easily as he can into one in Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, or Indiana, because they are on the boats that go back and forth.

Mr. SHARP. Would the gentleman want him sent two or three hundred miles to Buffalo from a lake port when he was suddenly injured?

Mr. MANN. If he is on a boat he may just as well go to Buffalo; but a large share of these sailors are taken care of under the Marine-Hospital Service in city hospitals, and that is paid for by the Government, and it is much cheaper to do it in that way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We appropriate $126,000 to enable that to be done.

Mr. MANN. It is much cheaper to do that than to provide a marine hospital at every port. The gentleman would not want to have a marine hospital at every port on the Lakes, and yet if you do not have one at every port you may have to transport a sailor from one place to another. As a matter of fact, if a sailor is ill in a port there is provision made for taking care of him in the ordinary hospitals at the expense of the Government. If there is occasion for him to go into a Government hospital, he can go into one that is now maintained at Buffalo or some other place.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's suggestion as to maintaining a marine hospital at every lake port, I would say no, unless there was urgent need for it. The place I have in mind does not ask for the establishment of a marine hospital. Those interested merely ask for the establishment of a ward in the hospital already built. The expense would be nominal.

To-day the patients have to be sent a considerable distance away. While I agree fully with the gentleman that it would be an unnecessary expense perhaps for the Government of the United States to build these hospitals at all lake ports, yet in the particular case to which I refer, the city of Lorain, there is a hospital there, a Catholic institution, doing a great amount of good, and it offers free of charge a portion of the hospital. It is planned and intended to occupy only a small portion of it, free of charge to the Government, for the establishment of a ward in that hospital.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I can see no reason why the Government should establish a ward there, so far as that is concerned. The Government is under no obligation to take care of these sailors. As a matter of fact, Lorain, Chicago, and other ports on the Lakes, where these people in the main live who do the business connected with the lake navigation, ought to take care of them without asking the Federal Government to do it, but we do this because that was the custom when there was no provision for them in the ports.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have given all that the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Department asked for this purpose, in any event.

The Clerk read as follows:

Quarantine Service: For the maintenance and ordinary expenses, exclusive of pay of officers and employees, of quarantine stations at Portland, Me.; Providence, R. I.; Perth Amboy, N. J.; Delaware Breakwater; Reedy Island; Alexandria, Va.; Cape Charles and supplemental station thereto; Cape Fear, Newbern, and Washington, N. C.; Georgetown, Charleston, Beaufort, and Port Royal, S. C.; Savannah; South Atlantic; Brunswick; Cumberland Sound; St. Johns River; Biscayne Bay; Key West; Boca Grande; Tampa Bay; Port Inglis; Cedar Key; Punta Rassa; St. Georges Sound (East and West Pass); St. Joseph, St. Andrews, and Pensacola, Fla.; Mobile; New Orleans and supplemental stations thereto; Pascagoula; Gulf; Laredo, Eagle Pass, and El Paso, Tex.; San Diego, San Pedro and adjoining ports, Santa Barbara, San Francisco, Monterey, and Port Harford, Cal.; Fort Bragg, Eureka, Columbia River, Florence, Newport, Coos Bay, and Gardner, Oreg.; Port Townsend and supplemental stations thereto; quarantine system of the Hawaiian Islands, including the leprosy hospital; and the quarantine system of Porto Rico, and including not exceeding $500 for printing on account of the quarantine service at times when the exigencies of that service require immediate action, $155,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice the leprosy hospital in Hawaii is carried in this general item, whereas last year and this year and for some time it has been carried in a special item. Is that the way the department wants that? Will we want the leprosy hospital there or is it intended to get rid of it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The truth is the Marine-Hospital Service engaged in leprosy work upon the islands are not at the island of Molakai. They do their work at some other place. The change was made so as to permit a very small expenditure to be made at Molakai of this fund, and the officers are provided for as heretofore. We do not affect the hospital at all.

Mr. MANN. There is quite a rearrangement of the public-health service in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have taken a number of physicians and assistant physicians who have been paid out of the epidemic fund practically who have become a permanent force and transferred them to the other appropriations so as to know what is being done.

Mr. MANN. You have taken a number of positions paid out of the quarantine fund, not the epidemic fund; you may have done that, too.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are $245,000 out of the quarantine fund and $126,000 out of the epidemic fund.

Mr. MANN. Your quarantine fund in this bill is $155,000 and includes the leprosy hospital; that itself is $32,000, and last year the quarantine fund was $400,000. Now, I notice in your compensation of commissioned officers that is increased from two hundred and seventy thousand to four hundred and thirty-seven thousand and some dollars, so I suppose a considerable portion of the quarantine fund was and is now being paid out for salaries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We put it with the salary item, and the provision for the leprosy work in the Hawaiian Islands is continued as heretofore.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee, upon line 1, page 48, where the word "Gulf" is used ought it not to be "Gulfport"? I think it is merely a misprint. It is right after the word "Pascagoula," and reads "G-u-l-f."

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the name of the station known as the Gulf Station. It is that particular station, and this paragraph refers to that particular station.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. MANN. That is the way it has been carried heretofore.

The Clerk read as follows:

Prevention of epidemics: To enable the President of the United States, in case only of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, typhus fever, yellow fever, smallpox, bubonic plague, Chinese plague, or black death, to aid State and local boards, or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same, and in such emergency in the execution of any quarantine laws which may be then in force, $100,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the figures "$100,000," in line 19, and insert the figures "$500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 19, strike out the figures "$100,000" and insert the figures "$500,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this Marine-Hospital Service, quarantine service, and the expenditure of the epidemic fund is very well organized and ought to have ample funds to meet any emergency that may arise. In my judgment there is no branch of the public service that is more efficiently administered than this. I could talk, and so could other men who would give a little consideration to it, about the extent of our organization of the great cities of the country subject to the outbreak of epidemics that come—yellow fever, smallpox, the plague, black death plague, and all the other ills that flesh is heir to that are very destructive to human life. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Now, from time to time there have been liberal and continuing appropriations for the epidemic fund. In 1910 it was $750,000; in 1909, $500,000; in 1908, $400,000; in 1907, $200,000; in 1906, $100,000; in 1905, $100,000; in 1902, $500,000; in 1901, $500,000; in 1900, $100,000; in 1899, $200,000; in 1894, $200,000, and so on.

There is now, as shown by a special document containing an estimate for $500,000 submitted by the Treasury Department, unexpended $112,000. Gentlemen who have gone into a consideration of these matters know the ravages of the plague, especially in San Francisco and in some cases at Seattle, the effort to exterminate the rat, the effort to exterminate those difficulties in the principal cities in California, the ground squirrel that carries this plague, and with our many coasts, with many centers for the yellow fever south of us, no one can tell when the expenditure of this money will be necessary. It may be that we may be blessed with health; it may be that we may not have an invasion of cholera, as we did have at New York during this last season. It may not strike us at New Orleans; it may not strike us anywhere on our greatly extended coasts. I trust it will not, but I believe that this fund should always be sufficient to meet all emergencies that may arise. The committee recommend after consideration $100,000, with $112,000 coming over from a former year, 1910, and remaining unexpended.

The estimate is for $500,000. I believe the amendment ought to be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is an emergency fund. At the end of the present fiscal year there will be a balance of $50,000. The Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service is spending in California at the rate of about $14,000 a month, and anticipates that this fund will be utilized there until the 29th day of September. Congress will convene in December. This $100,000, in addition to the ordinary appropriation for the maintenance of the service, I think is ample to provide whatever assistance may be necessary. In 1905 $100,000 was appropriated; in 1906 $100,000 was appropriated. Then came the bubonic-plague scare, and in 1909 $500,000 was appropriated, and in 1910 $750,000. And the liberality with which Congress made these appropriations resulted in the State of California practically determining to permit the Federal Government to do all of the work of exterminating the rodents which carried the flea which was responsible for the bubonic plague.

At the request of the State board of health in California a bill was passed in the legislature appropriating $75,000 to continue this work. The governor vetoed the bill. With the utmost difficulty the State board of health has obtained consent of the governor to devote $10,000 to this work during the coming few months. San Francisco is soon to have a great exposition. It should do its part of this work. If it does not, it is likely to be quarantined by the Federal Government and visitors from all parts of the country denied the opportunity to visit the exposition. We have given such a sum as will prevent the danger from epidemic of any character during the time that Congress will not be in session, and perhaps may impress upon California the necessity for doing something else than expecting the Federal Government to do everything essential to protect its citizens and the rest of the country from an affliction which may be occasioned by the conditions in that State.

There is no peculiar necessity for this sum. It was known when the regular estimates were transmitted to Congress what the condition of this fund would be at the end of the fiscal year. No estimate was submitted, and in submitting this estimate just a few days age the Secretary of the Treasury said it had been withheld until an opportunity should be given to thoroughly investigate and inquire into the matter with a view to promoting the economy in the public expenditures. The estimate is the second largest estimate ever submitted in the history of the Government. The committee, in view of the situation, in view of the service established, and the knowledge of what could be done during the recess of Congress in case of necessity with an appropriation of $100,000, believed that that would be ample to meet any emergency. And, I might say, too, Mr. Chairman, there has been transferred to another appropriation salaries which have been paid out of this fund aggregating $126,000. Out of the $750,000 which was appropriated in 1910, $260,000 was expended in compensation of officials who will hereafter be provided for out of the appropriation a few pages earlier in the bill. So the same necessity for this large appropriation, the making of which introduced and resulted in the building up, without action by Congress and without its knowledge and without its intentions, of a very large force will be obviated by the pursuance of this particular practice. In the absence of any threatened danger the committee did not feel it advisable to appropriate a larger sum, because it did not believe there would be any necessity for its use.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman whether, in those recent years where only $100,000 was appropriated, the unexpended balance of previous years was made available also?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has always been done.

Mr. MANN. So that, in those years where only $100,000 was appropriated, as the gentleman says, as a matter of fact there was available for expenditure a very considerable sum in excess of $100,000. I think there was available three or four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no knowledge that that is a fact.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say I do not know.

Mr. MANN. That is my recollection. In other words, this epidemic fund ought to be an epidemic fund. I agree with part of what the gentleman said in reference to California and in reference to some of the work done under this fund, but the Government ought to have an epidemic fund that can be used in case of epidemic emergencies.

If we are fortunate enough to get away from this Capitol ourselves by the middle or last of September there will then be a couple of months or so before Congress meets again. Possibly the danger of an epidemic will have been passed by that time. But we might have the good luck to get away by the middle of July. [Applause.] Now, I have been told by a gentleman whose knowledge and advice on the subject I consider of value that we are in some danger, although I hope not much, of the entrance of the bubonic plague, not merely from the Pacific side, but also from the Atlantic side. It certainly would be a catastrophe if, for the lack of a little money in the form of an emergency fund, we should not be able to handle that situation between the sessions of Congress. I think we ought to make an emergency epidemic fund which can be used only in case of an epidemic emergency, and which can not be used for the purpose of putting men permanently upon the pay rolls or doing permanent work.

I doubt very much whether the destruction of rodents in California ought to have been done out of this fund, if this fund has indeed been used for that purpose. But here we make a considerable reduction in the quarantine fund, and then in the epidemic fund——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We have not reduced the quarantine fund except to make an apparent decrease only. The amount by which that fund has been decreased has been transferred to the other appropriations.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing, if the gentleman says that, to accept his statement. I have not been able to find where the amount of the reduction in the quarantine fund has been transferred to any other fund or where a portion of it has been transferred to the fund for general compensation and another to the compensation of noncommissioned officers. The gentleman may be correct. I have been under the impression that the full amount heretofore carried for quarantine was not carried. But I am not criticizing that. We ought to have an emergency fund that could be used only in case of an epidemic, and it ought to be available.

Now, we expected the President to expend, and he did expend, a great deal of money out here in fighting forest fires—an amount which we afterwards made up. But I am not in favor of leaving the responsibility to the Executive of seizing money and spending it in case of an emergency, and then asking us to make it good. Where we know in advance that the emergency might arise, I do not believe the President ought to go beyond what we give him, no matter what the emergency is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] suggests that heretofore a large part of this money has been expended in the payment of salaries. I would like to know how anybody could spend this money except for the employment of people. Of course something could be spent for medicine, but the bulk of it must be spent for nurses and physicians and watchmen, and so on. It will not spend itself. Why, of course it is expended very largely for the activities of physicians, laborers, and nurses, so that calling it a "salary fund" is not, it seems to me, a valid argument against it. I was somewhat interested——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman agree with his colleague [Mr. MANN] that this money, this emergency fund, should not be utilized for the purpose of killing these rodents out in California?

Mr. CANNON. I believe, in view of the statements of the experts who hope that they have largely disposed of the plague in San Francisco and in Seattle, and who believe it is necessary to continue their investigations, and who have demonstrated, or profess to have demonstrated, that the germs of this plague affect rodent life in a considerable part of California, and perhaps of Washington as well, that these activities should be kept up for the purpose of destroying the ground squirrels. After all, it is expensive just to chase little ground squirrels. But there are a great many of them. Likewise there are a great many people at San Francisco and a great many people along the coast. While I do not know but that the gentleman's remarks might ordinarily appeal to me with very great force, yet if the governor of California, who vetoed the appropriation to assist in this work, were the only individual in California, and if California were out in the sea, and there were no communication between California and the 93,000,000 people in the United States, I would say, Let the rats and the ground squirrels and the bubonic plague and the governor of California fight. [Laughter.]

But, unfortunately, we all live in this country, and therefore, the governor of California being lax in assisting in this work, by interposing his veto, I will not allow the governor of California to prevent an appropriation or be used as an argument to prevent an appropriation for the general health and protection of ninety-odd millions of people in the United States.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois does not agree with his colleague [Mr. MANN] that this money should not be used for the purpose of killing these rats and ground squirrels, but should be retained for the purpose indicated in the appropriation, to wit, an emergency fund, to be utilized in case of an epidemic.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman [Mr. MANN] took that position, I am not in harmony with that suggestion, because an emergency fund is to meet an unexpected invasion of cholera, yellow fever, plague, or whatnot; but if it becomes chronic, I do not think that in looking out for the security of all the people we can afford to fail to pay attention to that chronic condition.

Mr. GARNER. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the language of this appropriation:

> In case only of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, typhus fever—

And so forth.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That does not say anything about the killing of rats and ground squirrels.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They will construe the presence of these plague-infested rats and ground squirrels as a threatened epidemic.

Mr. MANN. They will construe it as an actual epidemic.

Mr. KAHN. It would immediately create an epidemic, if they were allowed to scatter unchecked.

Mr. CANNON. The law has been construed heretofore to cover expenditures incurred in the work of exterminating these rats and ground squirrels, and the accounts have been audited. The law is what it is construed to be.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Reference has been made on the floor a number of times recently to the action of the governor of California in vetoing a bill appropriating $75,000 for exterminating squirrels. My colleagues from my State have investigated the matter somewhat, and they find that at a special session of the legislature, held about a year or so ago, a general law was enacted which provided for the extermination of these rats and ground squirrels by the local health officers; that law provided that if the owner of the property failed to do the work of extermination himself the local health authorities were to do the work, the cost thereof to become a lien upon the realty. Therefore it was held that this special appropriation was not necessary.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman from California agree with that conclusion?

Mr. KAHN. I have not studied the law. I simply tell the gentleman what my colleagues, who live in the counties where these squirrels are found, had learned as the result of their investigation of the subject.

Mr. GARNER. In view of the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], with reference to the governor and Legislature of California, I did not know but what the gentleman from California might express himself as to what he would have done if he had been governor.

Mr. CANNON. What would the gentleman have done if he had been governor?

Mr. GARNER. I think I would have approved the appropriation.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say this about it: When the fact was brought to the knowledge of the people of San Francisco that there were several cases of alleged bubonic plague in that city, they immediately went into their own pockets and subscribed many thousands of dollars to accomplish the work of killing off the rats.

The local government voted money, and every dollar that the Federal Government expended in the matter was met with a dollar from the citizens of California. It cost the city and county of San Francisco and her citizens hundreds of thousands of dollars for their share of that work. There is no bubonic plague in San Francisco, and there has not been a case for over a year and a half—that is, a verified case. But it was found that ground squirrels in the adjoining counties were infested with the flea that carries the plague. Since by means of these squirrels the infected flea may be carried long distances, the danger of a positive outbreak of bubonic plague exists so long as any infested squirrels are found. The counties where these squirrels are found are helping to exterminate them. There are in California large areas of public lands that have not been taken up; some of this land is in forest reserves; some of it is in forest-ranger stations; some of it is even embraced in public monuments; and some of it has never been filed upon for homestead, mining, or any other entry.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman tell us how much the State of California in its capacity as a State, by its legislature, has appropriated to exterminate these pests?

Mr. KAHN. As I stated at the outset, the State has not appropriated any money, so far as I know; but many of the counties have appropriated money, and the State legislature passed a general law making it a lien upon private property if the owner of the property refuses to exterminate the rats or squirrels on his land, and the local authorities do the work for him.

So in that way—indirectly, to be sure—the State is doing its share of the work.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think that when the United States Government in a matter of this kind, of an epidemic or a plague or in case of infected animals, contributes any reasonable amount of money to cooperate with the State, that that is as far as the Government ought to go? Does not the gentleman think that as far as the internal health is concerned, for the reduction of disease in a State, that it is the duty of the State to do that and not depend upon the Federal Government? Is there anything more important for the State government, the local government, to attend to than to look after the health of its citizens?

Mr. KAHN. The local government in California is doing its work, not through the State organization, but through the county organizations.

Mr. BARTLETT. That covers the same purpose.

Mr. KAHN. Certainly, and the county organizations are doing the work; but a State law has been enacted which compels the individual who owns land to do his share of the work; when he fails to do it the local authorities go on his land and exterminate the rodents, and the cost of the extermination becomes a lien on that individual's property.

Mr. BARTLETT. What duty does the gentleman think devolves on the National Government under our form of government to take care of the health of localities within the States?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Georgia loses sight of this fact—that it is an easy matter to carry the infection in our day, where a freight train can convey the infected rats hundreds or even thousands of miles beyond the confines of the State. Rats do get on board of freight cars, and an infected rat can carry the fleas into the gentleman's own State, into the District of Columbia, and all over the Union. It is therefore a part of the duty of the National Government to prevent any possibility of that kind.

Mr. BARTLETT. One more question, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. From the record before the committee it appeared that the United States Government had been able to catch 600 of these animals—these ground squirrels and rats—and that they cost $1,000 apiece. Does the gentleman think that the Government ought to go to that extent in expenditure without the aid of the State?

Mr. KAHN. The State is aiding through the counties and also through its individual citizens. As I stated a few moments ago, when San Francisco had a number of cases of bubonic plague every dollar that was expended by the Federal Government found another dollar expended by the people of San Francisco.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, according to the record, if it cost the United States Government $600,000 to catch and kill 600 rats, it has cost the Government and the State of California together $1,200,000 to kill 600 rats.

Mr. KAHN. It cost California as much as it cost the Federal Government, and if it cost $600,000 to the Federal Government, it cost $600,000 to the State of California.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The Legislature of California appropriated $75,000 to assist in this work?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know; I have heard that statement on this floor, and I assume that it is so.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman represents California, and he is asking the United States Congress to assist in this work. I asked the question what the State of California did. He has told what the counties did. Now, I want to ask if it is not a fact that the legislature appropriated $75,000 to help this work, and the very popular and distinguished governor placed his veto on that appropriation?

Mr. KAHN. I believe that is the fact.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman indorse that action?

Mr. KAHN. But that very legislature, as I understand it, also passed this law of which I have spoken, making the cost of extermination a charge upon the property where the owner refuses to do his share of the work.

Mr. GARNER. I understand; but the governor of California did veto an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. KAHN. True.

Mr. GARNER. What does the gentleman from California think about that action of the governor?

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. KAHN. True; that has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. GARNER. I want to know whether the gentleman from California is willing to put his State in the attitude of refusing to help in this matter and indorses that action?

Mr. KAHN. I assume the governor probably sent a message to the legislature saying that in his judgment there should be a general law passed compelling every owner of property to do his share of the work, and if that owner refused to do it, then it should be done——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. KAHN. I would like to finish my answer to the gentleman from Texas, but I will yield; yes.

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask the gentleman this: If he thinks it sufficient for California to pass a law requiring people to kill rats on their own premises and that it would relieve the State of California from making an appropriation, then whether it is not also sufficient to relieve the General Government from making an appropriation, because, if effective, the rats would be killed?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman loses sight of this fact: That there are in California large areas of Government land that have not been taken up. Many of these squirrels are found on that land, and the local health authorities can not create a lien on the property of the General Government.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that many of the squirrels have been caught there, or if there were many more there that they would do any damage at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think we ought to limit this appropriation so as to permit the money to be expended only in destroying the squirrels on Government land?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I do not think that. I think this money should be expended to protect the health of the country. There was an epidemic of cholera in Europe last year. No one can tell but that the dread disease may be brought over here in some ship. This money ought to be used for purposes of that kind. One hundred thousand dollars would prove a mighty small amount if cases of genuine cholera should be brought over here from Europe.

Mr. SHERLEY. It seems to be at least more than the State of California is willing to put in the jack pot.

Mr. KAHN. The State of California, through its counties and citizens, has put over a million dollars into the jack pot.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know how much it put in last year?

Mr. KAHN. I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will tell the gentleman. It put in about $13,000, as against $22,000 or $23,000 on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. KAHN. That was in the counties outside of San Francisco.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the average of all the counties in California.

Mr. KAHN. There is no bubonic plague in San Francisco. They are not spending any of the money there. They are spending the money, I believe, in Contra Costa County, San Benito County, San Luis Obispo County, and some of the other counties.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman, in connection with this State law passed by the last legislature, under which a lien is placed upon the land of the resident who does not destroy the squirrels, has used the expression "his share." What is the share of the landlord?

Mr. KAHN. I presume if he owns three or four hundred acres of land, and there are a great many squirrels on his property, and he does not destroy them, thus compelling the local health authorities to go upon his land and kill them, he must pay in accordance with the area of land he owns, because the cost of extermination is larger on a large tract than it is on a small tract.

Mr. PAGE. Then does the law require that each landowner shall kill the rats on his own land——

Mr. KAHN. Yes; it requires him to do that; and where he fails to do it, the local health authorities do it for him and charge him for it.

Mr. PAGE. Then why should the National Government expend $14,000 in doing it?

Mr. KAHN. I have answered that half a dozen times. There are large areas of public lands in California that are not in any private ownership.

Mr. PAGE. Is the National Government only operating upon Government lands?

Mr. KAHN. I presume it is operating largely on Government lands, for my attention was called to this matter some months ago by the Secretary of Agriculture, who got his information from the foresters, and I presume that at the present time the foresters are operating on Government land.

Mr. PAGE. And being paid from the funds we are appropriating here through the Agricultural Department.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the foresters are not engaged in killing these rats and squirrels, but the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service is doing that. The foresters have reported the presence of infected squirrels on Government land.

Mr. PAGE. Oh, yes; that is true, but the testimony before the committee, given by the officers of the Marine-Hospital Service, is that this money is being expended in the counties of California.

Mr. KAHN. True; but the Government land is in the counties of California.

Mr. PAGE. Oh, no; not at all——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may be allowed five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Suppose all the land in private ownership in California was cleaned up of all the squirrels and those on the public lands were not destroyed, how long would it take for the privately owned lands to become restocked with these squirrels?

Mr. KAHN. It would not take any time at all; it would simply be a case of having put the money into a sieve. We would simply have been doing work to no purpose. These squirrels on these public lands would soon get back again on the privately owned lands if they be not exterminated on the public lands. The Pacific coast faces the Orient. Many of the diseases coming from the Orient are exceedingly infectious. They are brought over to our shores on ships. If they ever get beyond the confines of the Pacific Coast States it will cost the people of the United States many millions of dollars to exterminate them. There is probably no disease that is more terrible in its effect than bubonic plague. There is no disease that is harder to deal with, because it is carried in a peculiar way. It is carried by a flea which lives on rats and squirrels, and when the infected flea bites a human being that human being is in immiment danger of being taken with the bubonic plague. Now, under these circumstances we feel the extermination of these fleas essential to the health of all the people of the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I saw it stated recently in some newspapers of the coast that there has not been a case of bubonic plague on that coast for several years, four years, I believe they stated. Is that true?

Mr. KAHN. There has not been a verified case of bubonic plague in the city of San Francisco for about a year and a half, possibly two years, according to a report that I have seen.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They stated four years.

Mr. KAHN. I believe there were some cases the doctors diagnosed as bubonic plague in Contra Costa County and possibly some other counties some distance away from San Francisco, and it was through the discovery of those cases that it was found that the ground squirrels had become infested with the fleas. It was as a result of those cases that this money was expended by the Government and by the county authorities in order to exterminate the squirrels.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is well known in the entire western country, especially in my State, that there were many millions of prairie dogs or ground squirrels, something on the same species——

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, those have been exterminated on the land of private individuals by the private individuals and on the State lands by the State, and the Government has never been called upon to exterminate any of those rodents.

Mr. KAHN. But in the gentleman's State the Government never owned any land; the State always held its own lands; Texas never relinquished its public lands to the General Government, whereas in my State of California the Federal Government owns the public lands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But our State killed out the rodents on their own lands, and the individuals killed them on their lands.

Mr. KAHN. Would the gentleman have the people of California kill all the squirrels on the Federal Government's land as well as kill them on their own privately owned lands? Does the gentleman not know that there are millions of acres in the forest reserves that do not yield a cent of revenue to any county in California or to any county in those western States where these reserves are located?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is an entirely useless expenditure of public money.

Mr. KAHN. The case of Texas is not at all analogous.

Now, this item, in my judgement, ought to be increased. If there should be an outbreak of cholera or bubonic plague or any other infectious diseases, it would require many, many hundreds of thousands of dollars to wipe them out. I sincerely hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be adopted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in view of all of the misleading statements the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has made, at least the facts should be placed in the RECORD.

Last year the State board of health of California passed a resolution asking the legislature to appropriate $250,000 to enable the State board of health to cooperate with the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service in exterminating the rodents affected with flea that carries the possibilities of bubonic plague. The legislature passed a bill appropriating $75,000, and that bill was vetoed by a "progressive" governor in the State of California. Since 1908 the Federal Government has expended in California $1,044,176.37. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] repeated a number of times that the State and the counties and——

Mr. KAHN. And private individuals.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Had expended as much as the Federal Government.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; that is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I took occasion to request that a statement be filed with the committee showing how much had been expended by the State of California and by the various counties and by voluntary subscriptions, and the gentleman from California is so far away from the facts in this respect that it is necessary to show that California is not doing its share in this work. Whether this be important work or not, I should not be as well able to say as the governor of California. On the 18th of May the State board of health of California had a meeting, and they went to the governor and they besought——

Mr. KAHN. The 18th day of May of what year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This year. And besought him for aid to enable them to cooperate in this work. In some manner or other he found some fund from which he allotted to the State board of health $10,000 to be expended between the 1st day of June and the 1st day of October. The Federal Government is spending at the rate of $65,000 during the same period. Since 1902—I gave the figures for the Federal Government since 1908——

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman now states what the Governor of California allowed to be appropriated from some fund. Has the gentleman also the figures of what was expended by the counties during that time and this time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Since 1902 the State of California has expended approximately $100,000. The individual counties of California have expended approximately $50,000. The other bay cities have expended approximately $25,000; the Citizens' Health Committee, of San Francisco, approximately $140,000; and individual landholders in the rural districts approximately $10,000 in the work of the eradication and the prevention of bubonic plague. This totals $235,000 since the year 1902. It is estimated that in the city of San Francisco, in the methods of construction of buildings so as to prevent rats getting access to them, not in the extermination of rats at all, but I suppose as the result of changed building regulations, it has cost about $2,500,000. But that was not in the work of extermination. The contributions from the State of California and the cities of California and the counties of California and the voluntary subscriptions of the people of California in 10 years have amounted to $235,000 as against $1,044,000 expended by the Federal Government since 1908. It seems to me that the governor of that State ought to pay some attention to the conditions in the State. He is the responsible head of the government there.

The people of San Francisco have invited people from all parts of the world to come and participate in an exposition to celebrate a very memorable enterprise—the completion of the Panama Canal. The Federal Government is doing more than its share to make it safe for the people of the United States and of other countries to go to that State, and yet this governor refuses to permit $75,000 passed by the legislature to be placed at the disposal of the State board of health, and he shows how important he considers this work by setting aside between the 1st day of June and the 1st day of October, to enable the State board of health to cooperate in this work, the sum of $10,000. I know if the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] could have his way his State would contribute liberally to the work.

It is useless to talk about laws that require the individual owner of property to exterminate these rats, under which, in the event the owner does not exterminate them, the county officials will go on the property of the individual and exterminate them and charge the cost to the owner and make the cost a lien upon the property. Such laws are absolutely worthless unless the necessary money be placed at the disposal of the officials to enable them to do work and afterwards to collect from the property owner.

I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] will himself join in this important agitation to bring home to the people of his State the necessity of compelling important State officials to wake up to the necessity for action by the State along those lines, and not to have any official thwarting the will of the legislature and defying the sober and serious judgment of the State board of health and denying it a mere pittance—to the State of California—$75,000 for this work, in the hope, indulged in by many of the men now belonging to a new school of politics, of devolving upon the Federal Government the entire expense of many things that properly belong to the State.

The Federal Government has done its full duty, and California should do its duty or else find out, as a result of such negligence, that the great enterprise in which it is interested will not be possible. If this situation continues in California and there should be an outbreak of bubonic plague I have been assured that California will be quarantined and nobody will be allowed either to enter or leave the State. In that event I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] will not be so unfortunate as to be caught on the wrong side of the line when the quarantine is put into effect. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the citizens of San Francisco had made an expenditure of approximately $2,500,000 to make their buildings rat proof?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Permanently rat proof, with other sanitary improvements.

Mr. KAHN. That was at the time the rats were exterminated by reason of the plague. I want to say for San Francisco that I believe it to be freer from rats than any other city in the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the rats to which other cities extend their hospitality are not the serious menace to the population that San Francisco's rats happen to be. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. KAHN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the preservation, exhibition, and increase of the collections from the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government, and from other sources, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employees, and all other necessary expenses, $250,000, of which sum $5,500 may be used for necessary drawings and illustrations for publications.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. How much of this $250,000 will be expended on the work of our former President? Or can the gentleman inform us if any of this amount will be used for that purpose? Can the chairman enlighten us as to how much has been expended for that purpose—for his last trip?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that no special amount has either been set aside or is contemplated to be set aside for the preparation or exhibition of the specimens and collections procured by Col. Roosevelt in his African expedition. It was never intended that they should constitute a separate exhibit. Various specimens are taken and mounted and put in the collections, so as to show the continuity of the development of the species. The other skins and trophies are preserved and put away in such shape that they can be utilized by students. That is done with the great majority of the collections in the National Museum. But the collection of Col. Roosevelt has not been treated and is not intended to be treated differently from any other collections that are obtained by the museum, and no special account has been taken of the expenditure on what may be termed the collection of one expedition or another. It is a part of the general work of the National Museum.

Mr. SABATH. Is there a way to ascertain how much this Roosevelt expedition cost the Nation at this time? I have been informed by some people that over $82,000 was allowed and paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much?

Mr. SABATH. Eighty-two thousand dollars for the expedition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe that was paid for by the Federal Government.

Mr. SABATH. I mean from the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, nothing at all. The Smithsonian Institution has some private funds that could be devoted to some such purpose, but my information is that when it was known that Col. Roosevelt was about to make this expedition and offered to send to the Smithsonian Institution the various trophies that he would obtain in that expedition, the character of the expedition he desired to make appealed to some persons, and by private subscriptions from persons interested in such matters certain of the expenses of the expedition were paid. All that the Government did was to grant leave of absence to one man, who is a physician and quite eminent as a naturalist, if I recall correctly, and some other man who was to be of service in some other way; but the Government did not pay any part of the expenses of the expedition. Whatever was contributed by the Smithsonian Institution was either from funds that were not Government funds and that were available for such purposes, or were obtained because Mr. Walcott, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, believing that valuable results could be obtained for the institution, presented the matter to some gentlemen who were interested in such things, and they voluntarily contributed money to enable the expedition to be conducted on a scale that would result in valuable returns to the museum.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman does not undertake to say positively that the expedition of Col. Roosevelt did not cost the Federal Treasury any money?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my information; that it cost the Government nothing outside of the fact that an Army officer—a physician, or something—while on leave, was under salary; but I do not consider that that was paying any part of the expenses of the expedition.

Mr. GARNER. But did not these same Government officials get their expenses paid by the Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I was one of the regents of the Smithsonian Institution at that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Here is a distinguished regent of the Smithsonian Institution, who probably is somewhat familiar with what happened. I shall be very glad if the representative of that institution will give us the information we desire.

Mr. MANN. I was a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution at the time this work was done. When we learned that Col. Roosevelt was going to make his trip to Africa, we thought it would be extremely desirable to have him give to the Smithsonian the trophies which he secured there. The Smithsonian has an appropriation from the General Government. It also has the interest of an invested fund of in the neighborhood of $1,000,000, but it could not utilize either one of these funds for that purpose, because they were already taken up with the regular, ordinary work. We passed a resolution offering to contribute a portion of the expense of Col. Roosevelt's trip—but no part of his personal expenses—providing the secretary of the institution, Dr. Walcott, could raise the money through private subscription. That money was raised through private subscription.

I have seen some of the specimens which came to the Smithsonian Institution from that trip. We have secured the best collection of African specimens that are owned or controlled by any nation in the world. A great many of these are in duplicate. This appropriation will probably be used in part for the mounting of a portion of those specimens by the regular officials who do the mounting. Other specimens will be retained for the use of students. Other specimens are retained for the purpose of exchange, as Col. Roosevelt gave to the Smithsonian Institution practically all the specimens he secured, with the exception of a very few. Their number is wonderful, and the character of the specimens is exceptional. Gentlemen who go there when these specimens are mounted will be extremely thankful that this was done. The opportunity was a great one, which was seized by the authorities in charge of the Smithsonian. They paid no portion of the personal expenses of Col. Roosevelt or of his son, but did pay for gentlemen to go with him to help take care of the specimens, and the necessary people to carry them and carry the required equipment into the field.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from New York intend to offer an amendment increasing the amount of this appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not.

Mr. CANNON. Then I desire to offer an amendment. I move to amend, in line 13, page 50, by striking out the figures "250,000" and inserting the figures "320,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 13, strike out the figures "250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "320,000."

Mr. CANNON. I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York, and it is now about half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16674. An act to establish a subport of entry and delivery at Indiana Harbor, in the State of Indiana;

H. R. 17679. An act to make Bay City, Mich., a subport of entry; and

H. R. 19476. An act granting certain lands to the State of California to form a part of California Redwood Park, in said State.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 11, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury requesting authority from Congress to make payment of certain bills arising in connection with various public buildings of the Government (H. Doc. No. 826), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6946) authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Flathead Indian Reservation to the town of Roman, State of Montana, for the purposes of a public park and public-school site, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 859), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3203) to authorize the sale of certain lands within the Umatilla Indian Reservation to the city of Pendleton, Oreg., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 866), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5545) providing for the issuing of patent to entrymen for homesteads upon reclamation projects, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 867), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6618) granting an increase of pension to Zachariah T. Woodward, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LITTLETON: A bill (H. R. 25235) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25236) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. McKELLAR: A bill (H. R. 25237) regulating trials by jury; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. AUSTIN: A bill (H. R. 25238) authorizing and permitting M. C. McCanless, W. C. Hale, W. H. Mullins, John Loop, and E. M. Brant, their successors and assigns, to build and maintain dams and water-power development in and across Clinch River in Grainger, Claiborne, and Hancock Counties, State of Tennessee; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HARRISON of New York: A bill (H. R. 25239) imposing a tax upon and regulating the production, manufacture, and distribution of certain habit-forming drugs; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25240) to amend the act of October 1, 1890 (26 Stats., 1567), regulating the manufacture of smoking opium within the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25241) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes," approved February 9, 1909; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 25242) conferring upon tribes or bands of Indians the right of nomination of their agent or superintendent, to inspire them to interest themselves in their own affairs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: A bill (H. R. 25243) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the State of New York two bronze or brass fieldpieces or cannon, with their carriages and outfit of cannon balls, etc.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) requesting the President to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FULLER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, for the creation by Congress of at least two additional judicial circuits, etc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. AYRES: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, that the Navajo Indian Reservation be thrown open to settlement; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. DRAPER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, asking for additional judicial circuits; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, asking that the Navajo Indian Reservation be thrown open to settlement; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, asking that a specific duty be levied on wool on scoured-shrinkage basis; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PATTEN of New York: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, praying that the Navajo Indian Reservation be opened to settlement; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, asking that a specific duty be levied on wool; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, praying for additional judicial circuits, one of which to include New Mexico; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CURRY: Memorial of the State Legislature of New Mexico, requesting Congress to amend Schedule K of the tariff bill by inserting therein the specific duty on wool on the scoured-shrinkage basis; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of New Mexico State Legislature, memorializing the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States to allot and open the Navajo Indian and other reservations to settlers; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, memorial of the State Legislature of New Mexico, asking for additional judicial district; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOWMAN: A bill (H. R. 25244) for the relief of George E. Guthrie; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: A bill (H. R. 25245) granting an increase of pension to Julius A. Hanover; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 25246) for the relief of Cornelius P. Vankirk; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25247) for the relief of the heirs of Nancy Wilson, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 25248) granting an increase of pension to David Steers; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GOULD: A bill (H. R. 25249) granting an increase of pension to Ella E. Evans; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25250) granting an increase of pension to Van R. Eels; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25251) granting an increase of pension to John S. Gilmore; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HENSLEY: A bill (H. R. 25252) granting a pension to Anna Klushmann; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOBSON: A bill (H. R. 25253) granting an increase of pension to Rachael Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LANGLEY: A bill (H. R. 25254) to provide for appointment to certain positions without examination in the classified service of persons who served in the Civil War or the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection and were honorably discharged; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. LOBECK: A bill (H. R. 25255) to correct the military record of Hugh McCormick; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OLDFIELD: A bill (H. R. 25256) granting an increase of pension to Eli N. Evans; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OLMSTED: A bill (H. R. 25257) granting a pension to Augusta Sperry; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 25258) granting a pension to Eliza Haines; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PETERS: A bill (H. R. 25259) for the relief of Andrew Browning Atwell, alias Andrew Browning; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 11, 1912.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our heavenly Father, who didst send Thy Son into the world, not to condemn the world, but that the world might be saved, save us, we humbly pray Thee, from all doubt of Thy goodness and from all questioning of Thy providence. As Thou hast called another Member of this Congress from the labors of earth, deepen, we pray Thee, our trust in Thee and grant that while we have the light we may walk in the light, knowing that the night cometh when no man can work.

And unto Thee, with whom is no darkness at all, neither shadow that is cast by turning, be glory and praise now and for evermore. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution (No. 43) of the House, providing for the printing of Public Health Bulletin No. 51, entitled "The causation and prevention of typhoid fever."

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing and directing the Clerk of the House of Representatives in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13041) to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia, to insert on page 1, line 12, after the word "within," the word "or," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1 and 2 and disagreed to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 3 and 4 to the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 16674. An act to establish a subport of entry and delivery at Indiana Harbor, in the State of Indiana;

H. R. 17679. An act to make Bay City, Mich., a subport of entry;

H. R. 19476. An act granting certain lands to the State of California to form a part of California Redwood Park, in said State; and

H. R. 23626. An act to appropriate $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to equip all Army transports with all lifeboats and rafts necessary to accommodate every person for which transportation facilities are now provided on said transports and the crew of said transports.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of the congregations of the Universalist Church of Milford and of the Union Evangelical Church, of Hopedale, and of the president of the Milford National Bank, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURTON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Stillwater, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to encourage rifle practice and promote a spirit of patriotism among the citizens and youth of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Cheshire County, N. H., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation to maintain the present water rates in the District, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of the board of trustees of the Board of Trade of Paterson, N. J., praying that an appropriation of $200,000 be made for the continuance of the President's Economy Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WORKS. I have here a telegram from the City Club of Los Angeles, Cal., composed of leading citizens and business men of that city, relating to pending legislation, that I should like to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CAL., June 8, 1912.

Senator JOHN D. WORKS,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas 28 years of experience with merit system in National Government has demonstrated its principles sound and absolutely essential to good government; and

Whereas retention in office during good behavior and efficiency is one of the most important of these principles; and

Whereas a limited tenure with discretionary power of reappointment in hands of head of department would open door to all of the political evils of the spoils system: Therefore be it

Resolved by the City Club of Los Angeles, That the Senate Committee on Appropriations be, and hereby is, respectfully urged to strike out section 5 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), which section provides for five-year tenure of office for Government employees; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Senate through Senators from California. Senator WORKS, kindly transmit to Senator PERKINS.

THOMAS E. GIBBON, President.
FRANK G. ANDERSON, Secretary.

Mr. OLIVER (for Mr. PENROSE) presented a petition of members of the Lohr's Memorial United Brethren Sunday School, of Hanover, Pa., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of sundry citizens of the United States, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CUMMINS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 16689) legalizing certain conveyances heretofore made by the Union Pacific Railroad Co., and I submit a report (No. 868) thereon. I also report back the bill S. 6587, with like title, with the recommendation that the latter bill be indefinitely postponed. It is identical with the former. I desire that the House bill on which the report is made be printed showing the amendment proposed by the committee, and also that the report of the committee, which is in writing, shall be printed with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is done without special order. The House bill will be placed upon the calendar and the identical Senate bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DU PONT. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 869) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN ALASKA.

Mr. JONES. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read, together with the papers which I send to the desk, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 116) appropriating $50,000 for the relief of the inhabitants of Kodiak Island and vicinity from effects of explosion of the Katmai and other Alaska Peninsula volcanoes was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sum of money, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the relief of sufferers of Kodiak Island or Alaska Peninsula, and that vicinity, from destruction of their homes and property and the loss of lives resulting from the explosion or explosions of the Redoubt, Illamna, and Katmai Volcanoes, on the Alaska Peninsula, namely: Treasury Department: To be expended by the Treasury Department through the Revenue-Cutter Service in purchasing supplies and providing provisions, tents, and other shelter for destitute persons, medical attendance, and other aid which the emergency may require, the sum of $50,000. The Revenue-Cutter Service in Alaskan waters is authorized to go to the relief of settlements in that neighborhood and provide rations and supplies and carry people from the danger zone to safety.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have the telegrams read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEWARD, ALASKA, June 10, 1912.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE,
Washington, D. C.:

St. Paul and Wood Island villages, Kodiak, buried 1 foot. Volcanic eruption of 48 hours ashes, sand, and pumice stone. Other settlements doubtless in same or worse condition, and am sending all relief parties possible by drafting available craft. No lives lost here as yet. Water ashore polluted and great distress among natives. Manning provided refuge for all inhabitants throughout and should remain here indefinitely. Another cutter needed to take lighthouse supplies to westward, if practicable. Am compelled to use large amounts of ship's rations for refugees, and must continue this to the destitute unless other aid arrives. Furnishing quarters, food, and water from distiller to about 500 at present, many women and children. Naval wireless station at Wood Island totally destroyed by fire except aerial masts, and Manning's radius too small to reach any station, consequently drafting tug to take dispatches to Seward. Committee of officers and citizens appointed by me to take charge urge strongly need of Government emergency fund with which supplies can be shortly obtained. Approve recommendation. Experience terrible, and much of the time all hands seemed in imminent danger of suffocating. Not known what volcanic was caused. Believed extent of territory covered amount of precipitation far beyond that of any modern history. Ask to be confirmed in past and future actions as far as possible in name of humanity. Searles detailed by me; must wait at Seward for reply or orders.

PERRY,
Captain Revenue Cutter Manning.

THE CHEMICAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. WATSON. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed as an additional section to the bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the amendment was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WATSON as an additional section, to be known as section —, to the bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, by adding to section 2 of said act the following:

"Provided, That if, with respect to any article or commodity upon which an import duty is laid under the provisions of this act, substantial, effective, and actual competition as to the extent of production, price for sale, or manner of distribution has ceased, or shall in future cease, to exist among domestic producers or sellers, or both, generally throughout the United States, or if the buyers, users, or consumers of any such article or commodity are now or shall hereafter be deprived, and without regard to the cause or causes of such deprivation, generally throughout the United States, of the benefits and advantages of substantial, effective, and actual competition with respect thereto, or if through the scarcity of production, due to curtailment, failure, or other natural or artificial causes, the price for sale of any such article shall be abnormally enhanced, then and so long as such conditions, or any of them, shall exist, not to exceed six months, all imports of such articles or commodities shall be admitted free of duty into all ports of the United States, and the President is hereby authorized, in case of such emergencies, to suspend the collection of customs duties on any article included for taxation in the tariff law in effect on the day the President issues his proclamation suspending the collection of duty on any article, so that such article may be imported free of duty, not to exceed the six months specified. When the President decides to suspend the collection of duties on any article he shall issue his proclamation to that effect. Such suspension of the collection of customs duties shall take effect on the day following the issuing of said proclamation."

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL (H. R. 25069).

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for improvements at the Fort Taylor Military Reservation, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 for the repair of the fisheries steamer Albatross, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the establishment of a fisheries experiment station in Alaska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for a steam vessel for use at the fish-cultural station at Boothbay Harbor, Me., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

STATISTICS OF CORPORATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 788).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate, adopted May 30, requesting me to send to the Senate a compilation of the returns made by corporations for internal-revenue purposes for the year 1910 and also for 1911, so as to show the total number of corporations engaged in the iron and steel industry, and certain other totals in respect to the operation of those corporations, I beg to forward a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which explains why the statistics called for by the Senate resolution can not be given. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury shows what is available, and if the Senate resolution will give the names of the corporations in respect to which it desires the totals mentioned, I shall have pleasure in asking the Secretary of the Treasury to comply with the request thus made more specific.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 11, 1912.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act:

On June 11, 1912:

S. 4791. An act authorizing the patenting of certain lands to rural high-school district No. 1, of Nez Perce County, Idaho.

SUPPORT OF BASTARDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 54) of the House of Representatives, which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13041) entitled "An act to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia," to insert, on page 1, line 12, before the word "within," the word "or."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask that the Senate concur in the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 24023, the legislative appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] wishes to bring up a very small but important matter, and I will yield to him.

ROBERT H. PECK.

Mr. WORKS. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the bill (S. 6636) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Robert H. Peck a captain in the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States in his discretion be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Robert H. Peck to the grade of captain of Infantry, United States Army, to take rank at the foot of the list of captains of Infantry; and that no back pay or allowances shall accrue as a result of the passage of this act; and that there shall be no increase in the total number of officers now authorized by law by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from California briefly state the reason for this bill?

Mr. WORKS. It is a case, Mr. President, where the officer was tried by a court-martial and was dismissed from the service. I have examined the evidence quite carefully, and it has been examined by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and also by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House and favorable reports have been made in both cases. It is quite evident that the verdict which was reached was too harsh and unjust. This is simply an effort to restore him with the loss of time and pay. I think it is an entirely just bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, in view of the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to go on this morning with the appropriation bill I will give notice that to-morrow morning after the routine morning business I shall call up Senate bill No. 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has already given notice of his desire to call up the naval appropriation bill at that time.

Mr. CLAPP. I have had a notice appearing on the calendar for several days that following the appropriation bill now pending I shall ask the Senate to consider the Indian appropriation bill. I think we ought to go on with that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending appropriation bill will be proceeded with.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is an amendment offered by the committee, on page 141, line 22, after "$4,800" and the semicolon, to insert:

Physicist, qualified in optics, $4,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina rises to a point of order, which he will please state.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say that that is not a committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator excuse me for a moment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to put that matter right. I wish to say that the Senator from North Carolina, who is a constant hard-working member of the subcommittee, is right. I offered it believing it was a committee amendment, because I assumed that it had been shown to him as have all the other committee amendments; and I have been careful, so far as I knew, to offer no amendment that had not the proper indorsement of the committee. Therefore it now stands as an amendment of mine individually, and not as a committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Therefore, unless the Senator has concluded presenting committee amendments, it will not now be in order.

Mr. WARREN. For the present I have concluded presenting committee amendments, although another one may follow after a little further information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is another proposition. Amendments by Senators are then in order, and the Senator from Wyoming presents the following amendment personally.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not in order now, not being a committee amendment. The consideration of the bill has not been finished under the unanimous-consent agreement that the bill should be read for action on committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The Chair had forgotten that certain amendments were passed over.

Mr. WARREN. So that there may be no misunderstanding, I think it is in order now to proceed to consider the important sections relating to the Commerce Court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly. The Secretary will report the first amendment which was passed over by unanimous consent.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment passed over is on page 147, where the committee proposes to strike out all of lines 11, 12, 13, and 14. They read as follows:

No circuit judge shall hereafter be appointed until the whole number of circuit judges shall be reduced to 29, and thereafter there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. That amendment ought to be taken up in connection with section 10, and I ask that the three paragraphs or sections be considered together. They all involve the same matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, it is quite possible to discuss the whole matter, but the amendments will have to be voted on separately.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand. I think that the amendment which has been read and section 10 and another section ought to be considered now.

Mr. WARREN. I agree to that. The whole subject may be discussed, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, then, the Secretary will also report the other amendments at this time.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by the committee to insert at the top of page 150 the following words:

United States Commerce Court: For clerk, $4,000; deputy clerk, $2,500; marshal, $3,000; deputy marshal, $2,500; for rent of necessary quarters in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and furnishing same for the United States Commerce Court; for books, periodicals, stationery, printing, and binding; for pay of bailiffs and all other necessary employees at the seat of government and elsewhere, not otherwise specifically provided for, and for such other miscellaneous expenses as may be approved by the presiding judge, $50,000; in all, $62,000.

It is also proposed——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to suggest that section 10 be also read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Secretary was just instructed to do.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to strike out all of section 10, on pages 157 and 158, in the following words:

SEC. 10. That the Commerce Court is abolished on and after July 1, 1912, and all laws in so far as they provide for the establishment of said Commerce Court are repealed. The jurisdiction now vested in the Commerce Court is hereby transferred to, and vested in, the district courts of the United States. All cases pending in the Commerce Court at the date of the passage of this act shall be transferred forthwith to said district courts. Each of said cases shall be transferred to the district court wherein it might have been filed at the time it was filed in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect, and if it might have been filed in any one of two or more district courts it shall be transferred to that one of said district courts which may be designated by the petitioner or petitioners in said case, or, upon failure of said petitioners to act in the premises within 10 days after the passage of this act, to such one of said district courts as may be designated by the judges of the Commerce Court. The judges of the Commerce Court shall have authority, and are hereby directed, to make any and all orders and to take any other action necessary to transfer as aforesaid the cases then pending in the Commerce Court to said district courts.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to say on the part of the committee that this was carefully considered by the subcommittee and by the full committee. It is but right to say that it is not reported unanimously. There was objection in the subcommittee and there were objections in the full committee, but the majority of the committee—I do not speak of partisan majority—believed that the Commerce Court, having been established, ought at least to have further time to demonstrate what it can do and whether it should be retained or not.

I am not going to enter into any extended argument concerning the court. I leave that to those who are learned in the law and who can better defend or attack, as the case may be; but I desire to say that it seems to me we ought not to go up the hill and down again in the few months which have elapsed without further consideration and further opportunity to find what are the full functions of this court and what may be its results.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I voted against the creation of this Commerce Court at the outset, for I never thought it ought to have been established. Being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I was one of the minority who voted against this amendment. I do not propose to discuss the court so much as to lay some facts before the Senate.

This court has shown a very reckless disregard of the rights of the people in the way of extravagance. We allowed them, in addition to their salaries, an expense allowance for judges at the rate of $1,500 per annum. They have drawn that money every month, and I have a statement here showing also the money they have drawn in the way of expenses.

We once had an impeachment on this floor of a judge, and one of the charges when we tried him was that he had charged $10 a day. The law allows a reasonable expense not exceeding $10 a day. It seems that these judges have been from time to time called away to different parts of the country to hold court, and some of them at least—nearly all of them—have charged the whole $10 a day.

I wish to publish this table in the RECORD showing the expense account. Judge Archbald charged, when he went to New York to hold court, from July 4 to July 31, $210, and August 3 and 4, $13.

Judge J. E. Carland, under order of December 18, 1911, at St. Louis, Mo., from January 6 to 25, charged $200, at $10 a day. Judge Hunt, under order of December 13, 1911, at Helena and Butte, Mont., December 17 to 31, $150.

You will see that each one of them charged the whole amount of $10.

Here are some other expenses. I do not know how they occurred. I will just publish this table in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

The following payments were made to judges of the Commerce Court, on account of expenses, from the appropriation "Pay of bailiffs, etc., United States courts":

Judge R. W. Archbald:
Order of June 9, 1911, at New York City—
July 4 to 31, 1911	$210.25
Aug. 3 and 4, 1911	13.30
Total	223.55
Judge J. E. Carland:
Order of Dec. 18, 1911, at St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 6 to 25, 1912	200.00
Judge William H. Hunt:
Order of Dec. 13, 1911, at Helena and Butte, Mont.—
Dec. 17 to 31, 1911	150.00
Jan. 1 to 21, 1912	210.00
Total	360.00
Judge Julian W. Mack:
Orders of Dec. 15, 1911, at Chicago, Ill., Dec. 19, 1911, Jan. 1 to 31, 1912, Feb. 3, 1912	310.00
Orders of Feb. 23, 1912, at Chicago, Ill., Mar. 2 to 14, 1912	103.35
Total	413.35

Information as to amounts paid or payable to the following-named judges under the orders mentioned has not yet been reported to the department. This information has been requested by wire:

Judge William H. Hunt: Order of April 10, 1912, at San Francisco, Cal., in May and June, 1912. Order of April 10, 1912, district court in Arizona, in April, 1912. Order of May 17, 1912, in northern district of California, in May 1912.

Judge Julian W. Mack: Orders of April 26 and May 15, 1912, district court in Arizona, in May and June, 1912.

A telegram has just been received from United States Marshal Overlock, of Arizona, relative to the expenses of Judge Mack, under orders of April 26 and May 15, 1912, which reads as follows:

"Your wire this date. Nothing has been paid Judge Mack, and he has not presented claim. He opened court May 1. Understand he left district May 30."

Under the "$1,500 allowance," each judge has drawn $125 per month. Total payments from July 1, 1911, to June 1, 1912, $6,875. Balance of appropriation $625—sufficient to pay allowance for month of June.

During the fiscal year, up to and including May 31, the expenses of judges incurred incident to the transaction of the business of the Commerce Court amount to $971.40, to wit:

Judge Hunt	$275.45
Judge Archbald	100.30
Judge Mack	369.20
A clerk	226.45
Total	971.40

Some of the judges have sat as circuit and district judges, and the amounts paid to them for expenses can not be stated on short notice. Can probably be furnished by Saturday morning if still desired.

Mr. BACON. My attention was diverted for a moment, and I will ask the Senator what is the time covered by the expense account of $10 a day?

Mr. OVERMAN. I was just reading it. Judge Carland, from January 6 to the 25th, charged $200—just 20 days.

Mr. BACON. Does that run along through the year in that way?

Mr. OVERMAN. There is in addition to that this $125 allowed in the way of expenses every month for each one of them.

So Judge Mack was ordered to Chicago December 15, 1911, and from December 19 to January 1 and to the 31st he charged $310 for 31 days at $10 a day. We passed a bill here reducing it to $7 a day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Utah will remember that we passed a bill fixing the expenses at $7 a day, but I do not suppose it became a law, because the auditor certainly would not have audited this account if it had. But the members of this court ought to have known what the Senate had done and what the sentiment of the Senate was as to reducing it to $7 a day. Anyway, they were allowed reasonable expenses not exceeding $10 a day. I do not know whether they furnished an itemized account or not, but I know they have drawn exactly $10 a day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not quite understand what is the complaint which the Senator from North Carolina makes. Does he insist that the expense of $10 a day was not incurred?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know. I am merely giving the Senator information that $10 a day was charged—exactly $10 a day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from North Carolina knows, I suppose, that each of these judges has been compelled to go away from Washington to hold court in other places, and that some expense was necessary.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no question about some expenditure. They are entitled to a reasonable expenditure up to $10 a day, but the remarkable thing I am talking about is that they charge exactly $10 a day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The account has been filed with the auditor, and has been approved by the auditor, as I understand.

Mr. OVERMAN. That may be; I do not know as to that. I just want to publish this in the RECORD, so that Senators and others may see it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to understand the position of the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I sent to the Treasury Department and got this account, and I know that these judges charge just exactly $10 a day. How they can make it $10 a day, I do not know. They sized up the amount they were entitled to, and took it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps their expenses may have been more than $10 a day, and under the law they were limited to $10 a day.

Mr. OVERMAN. They were limited to $10 a day, and the Senator from Utah voted for that compensation; but we thought $7 a day was enough.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the particular inference which the Senator from North Carolina seeks to draw from this?

Mr. OVERMAN. That they have drawn their $10, and after having been allowed expenses in addition to what other judges charge to the amount of $625 a year, or $1,500 a year each for expenses while living in Washington. In addition to that they have drawn their expenses, and even when they were away they have drawn $10 a day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from North Carolina think because the naked fact appears here that these judges have charged $10 a day for expenses—and we do not know definitely whether the expenses are proper or not, though the account has been approved by the auditor whose duty it was to investigate the account—that that justifies us in abolishing the court?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think that alone would justify us in doing so; but I am going to show some other things which they have done before I sit down.

Mr. BACON. I think there is one thing that can be very fairly presumed. We all of us have current expenses, and we all know, while occasionally we may incur an expense of $10 a day, that men in ordinary circumstances do not incur that much expenditure a day for their living, whether they are traveling or whether they are at home.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, I want——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before the Senator from North Carolina proceeds to a consideration of some other matters, I invite his attention—rather informally, however, for of course he is familiar with it—to a section of the law which created this court:

> Each of the judges during the period of his service in the Commerce Court shall, on account of the regular sessions of the court being held in the city of Washington, receive in addition to his salary as circuit judge an expense allowance at the rate of $1,500 per annum.

What I desire to know is, Are these judges, under the law, entitled to increased compensation in the way of expenditures when they are in Washington and also when they are away from Washington?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. CULBERSON. We pay them the salary of circuit judges when they are in Washington and give them $1,500 in addition for expenses. That is clear by this law.

Mr. OVERMAN. This statement shows they drew the whole amount of $1,500 up to this time. Each of them has drawn the whole amount.

Mr. CULBERSON. When they are away from Washington they draw the $10 a day and the $1,500 in addition for being here?

Mr. OVERMAN. This statement will show that to be the fact.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Those who followed the debates and participated in them at the time the court was established understand that that additional compensation or expense money which was allowed on account of the court sitting here in Washington was included as an additional salary on account of the fact that the judges were living here in the city of Washington, and the additional expense when they were away from Washington was the same as that provided for other judges who were out on their circuits or districts.

Mr. OVERMAN. The language of the appropriation is "expense allowance" for judges "at the rate of $1,500 per annum." It does not say they shall be allowed $1,500 for expense allowance, but the law says for each of the judges "at the rate of $1,500 per annum." I think that meant that they should while they were in Washington be allowed at the rate of $1,500, and when they were abroad they should be paid like other circuit judges of the United States a reasonable sum, not exceeding $10 a day.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina whether that $10 a day is for transportation or whether it includes——

Mr. OVERMAN. All I know is what is sent to me from the Treasury. They drew $10 a day, and in addition they drew their salaries.

Mr. CULBERSON. Has the Senator conveniently at hand the law providing for expenses not exceeding $10 a day for circuit judges?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have it not here, but I have examined it. I know we passed a bill here allowing them not exceeding $7 a day; but whether it passed the other House I am not advised.

When this court was established I noticed a great difference between what the Customs Court paid for rent and what the Commerce Court paid for rent. This court hired a floor in a building and paid $12,000 a year rent. They bought 5 swivel chairs for $61.25 each; they bought 25 armchairs at $58.75 each; then they bought, in addition, 6 leather chairs at $90 each; they bought for each judge a davenport at $175; they bought, in addition, 10 court-room chairs at $52 each; they bought "mahogany wainscoting with green marble base and standing trim in court room" at $2,172.

Mr. GALLINGER. What were the last items?

Mr. OVERMAN. This report says "mahogany wainscoting with green marble base and standing trim in court room, $2,172." They bought a screen for $895; 5 wardrobes at $94.25 each; 2 tables at $109 each; 2 library tables at $150 each; 5 desks at $163 each; 1 judge's screen at $895; 1 counter for $300; 1 bar rail with gate, $165; and 1 judge's bench that cost $1,055.

Mr. BACON. Did I understand the Senator to say "wardrobes"?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; wardrobes.

Mr. BACON. What are they for?

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, they said that part of them were to hang their coats in and the other part for file cases.

Mr. BACON. Hang their coats in! Do they not wear their coats?

Mr. OVERMAN. Their overcoats and gowns.

Mr. BACON. Oh, their gowns.

Mr. OVERMAN. I merely read this to show that this court has been evincing a reckless disregard of the rights of the people in this immense extravagance in equipping their court room. Go over to the Supreme Court of the United States; they have no such extravagance there, nor has any other court that I have ever been in.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did we vote a lump sum from which this money has been expended?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is one of the lump sums that we have had so much trouble about.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator in his position regarding lump sums, and I think we ought to stop appropriating money in that way, so far as possible.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire if the Senator has information as to what the court did with the $895 screen?

Mr. OVERMAN. All I know is that they have paid that much for it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They probably put that up in front of the bar. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I presume that is it. I see they have a bar rail, and I presume that is the reason for the screen.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all I have to say, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is rather on account of the recklessness and extravagance of the judicial opinions of this court that I object to the appropriation for it. I think the expensive chairs and sofas and the bar rail and screen ought to be relegated to some junk shop, if no better use can be made of them, and that the court itself ought to go along with them, so far as its existence as a judicial tribunal is concerned.

The debates on the bill providing for the creation of this court clearly show that the dividing line between those who were in favor of establishing it and those who were opposed to it was the line between those who were opposed to governmental supervision and regulation of the railroads, or at least opposed to extending in any way the governmental power in that respect, and those who were in favor of extending governmental supervision and regulation of the conduct of the railroads and the making of railroad rates; in other words, this court was interposed as an additional obstacle between the growing power of the Government—which had been developed through the Hepburn Act and other amendments of the interstate-commerce act of 1887, and construed by the Supreme Court of the United States—and the railroads. It has, in my judgment, faithfully fulfilled—and there can not be any dispute about it from the records of the court—the expectations, the purposes, and the intentions of those who were instrumental in incorporating it in the act of 1910. It is one of the astonishing features of our history that in the rapid development of the country only within the last 25 years has the Government attempted in any way whatever to regulate the enormous private interests involved in the railroads of the country; and that is true, notwithstanding the fact that the railroads exercise a public function.

The entire system of transportation in this country has been revolutionized since the Government was founded and since the instrumentalities of government were devised in the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution did not contemplate the questions which have arisen out of the growth of railways; they could not have contemplated them, because they could not have foreseen the invention of steam transportation.

It is true that there was incorporated in the Constitution of the United States a general clause giving the Federal Government power over interstate commerce; but that was framed and put in the structure of the Government with reference to its power to deal with interstate commerce in view of a simple and comparatively powerless and inoffensive system of transportation. From that time down to 1887, notwithstanding the fact that in the meantime railroads had been invented, had absorbed enormous capital, had abused the public franchises which had been granted to them, had gone into politics, had corrupted legislatures, and had discriminated between communities and between individuals, there still was such a force of public opinion to the effect that the railroads were private institutions that no attempt on the part of the Government was made to interfere with the abuse of this great power.

In 1887 the Interstate Commerce Commission was created. It was created under comparatively general terms; it had very few specific powers; it was organized and began its work, but very little was accomplished by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the act of 1887 in the way of preventing the abuses of the railroads. In 1906 the Hepburn Act was passed. Four years after the passage of that act it came before the Supreme Court for construction, particularly as relating to the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission over the railroads, and in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. The Illinois Central Railroad Co. the Supreme Court laid down a rule which vested the Interstate Commerce Commission with very extensive power under the law of 1906, not only in the regulation of the conduct of the business of the railroads, but in the fixing of rates, the prevention of discrimination both in furnishing cars and as to other public services in the line of railroad business. The syllabus of this case is found in 215 United States, page 452, and is as follows:

> In determining whether an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be suspended or set aside, power to make—and not the wisdom of—the order is the test and this court must consider all relevant questions of constitutional power or right, all pertinent questions as to whether the administrative order is within the scope of the delegated authority under which it purports to be made, and also whether even if in form it is within such delegated authority it is not so in substance because so arbitrary and unreasonable as to render it invalid.
> In determining whether the action of the court below was or was not correct, this court does so irrespective of the reasoning by which such action was induced.
>
> The equipment of an interstate railroad, including cars for transportation of its own fuel, are instruments of interstate commerce and subject to control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.
> The act to regulate commerce has delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to consider, where complaint is made on that subject, the question of distribution of coal cars, including the carrier's own fuel cars, in times of car shortage, as a means of prohibiting unjust preference or undue discrimination.
> Under section 15 of the act to regulate commerce as amended June 29, 1906 (C. 3591; 34 Stat., 585), the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to deal with preferential and discriminatory regulations of carriers as well as with rates.

That decision was rendered January 10, 1910, and it is a very significant circumstance that in the following June the act of 1910, which created the Commerce Court, was introduced. The sequence of events, the circumstances under which that act was introduced in Congress, and the sources from which it came make it perfectly evident that it was the effort of the railroad companies to escape from the effects of the decision of the Supreme Court defining the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case which I have just read.

In the debates in Congress upon that bill special attention was devoted to the question of whether or not the power of the courts to review the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission were extended by that act. It was contended on behalf of the advocates of the bill that the powers of the courts were not extended, and great care was taken to insert in the act creating the Commerce Court an express provision that the court could have no greater power to review the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission than the circuit courts had prior to the passage of that act; but notwithstanding the keen examination which was made of that bill by the able lawyers who discussed it and analyzed its various provisions, and notwithstanding the comparison of its terms with the law of 1906, there nevertheless remained in it when it was passed by Congress certain language which was not contained in the law of 1906, and the Commerce Court, the existence of which is involved in this appropriation bill, seized upon these new lines which had been incorporated in the law creating the court, and out of them deduced an authority, which was practically unlimited, to review the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the minority report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, made upon the Commerce Court bill, this question was discussed, and attention was called to the fact that in the law of 1906—the report says section 15; it really should have been section 16—this language was used:

> That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the commission. An appeal may be taken from the interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, the minority called attention to the fact that in the bill under consideration—that is, the bill creating the Commerce Court—

> All that part of section 15 [16] which relates to suits brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the commission is repealed, and the whole subject is disposed of in those sections of the present bill which create the United States Court of Commerce and set forth its jurisdiction and procedure.

Now, in that bill was contained this language:

> That suits to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought in the Commerce Court against the United States. The pendency of such suit shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but the Commerce Court, in its discretion, may restrain or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the commission's order, pending the final hearing and determination of the suit.

The Commerce Court, in the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, called attention to that language, which was not contained in the law of 1906, and upon the strength of it claimed an unlimited right, limited only by the rules of equity, to review the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In this case they say:

> The word "discretion" used in the law of course means a legal discretion, a discretion controlled and limited by sound principles of law applied to the facts in each particular case. The principles which govern courts of equity in granting temporary injunctions are well known to the profession and need not be stated here.

In other words, they assume whatever powers courts of equity have to grant preliminary injunctions in any case and applied it to the decisions of a tribunal which the legislative power, which created it, had attempted to protect from these things by the most explicit language, and they have proceeded to issue temporary restraining orders against the well-considered judgments of a tribunal which has investigated cases, in some instances for many years, as though it were a case which had never been tried or investigated by any tribunal. They have applied to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission the most liberal exercise of the power of temporary injunctions and verified in every respect the predictions which were made by the opponents of the bill creating the Court of Commerce—that it would change the law as to the power of review of the orders of the administrative tribunal.

It is true the Supreme Court has reversed these decisions, but the fact that we have in the Supreme Court of the United States, so long as the judges constituting it may administer the law, a protection against the efforts of this special tribunal to blanket and nullify the effects of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission—the mere fact that we have a protection from this court is no reason for continuing it unless some positive benefit is to be shown by the multiplication of these judges.

We now have more courts in one State in this country than in all of Great Britain. There is no necessity, in the amount of business, for the additional judges constituting this court; and, as I said when this question came up a few days ago, the creation of two special tribunals, both exercising jurisdiction over the same subject matter, is absolutely senseless legislation. That tribunal which has the appellate power necessarily claims to be superior, and the effect of the operation of two tribunals practically puts out of existence the inferior one.

Mr. President, it was a long struggle to invest in some effective administrative body the power which the Interstate Commerce Commission finally got under the Hepburn Act and the decisions of the Supreme Court, and it would be a calamity to the people of this country if all that was gained in that long struggle for the regulation of railroads is to be thrown away and destroyed by the continuance of an unnecessary court.

Of course those people who advocate the existence of that court advocate the unlimited right of merger. That is the general tendency. They are opposed to governmental interference with rate making. In the debates which took place in this body when this Commerce Court law was pending here, the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators opposed what they called rate making by law. A Senator who sits by my side, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], described his business and told how the railroads had investigated his business and determined how much freight he could afford to pay upon the freight he transported. In other words, they allowed him what they chose to allow him by way of profit. His existence as a business man, according to his statement—he seemed to be satisfied with it, because the railroads had apparently been liberal—was absolutely dependent upon the good will and generosity of the proprietors of the railroads which served the town in which his business is located.

Why should not the Government control the rate making of railroads? It is a governmental function. There is as much reason for the Government to build up a body of experts, particularly competent to make railroad rates and classify freights, as that the railroads should have such a body. The fact of the case is that the railroads have no scientific system or any general system at all upon which rates are made. I have heard one of the principal authorities in the employment of a railroad traffic department or the rate-making department testify upon the witness stand, in answer to a question asked by a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to what theory or system rates were based upon, that they had no theory or system; that the plan which they pursued was to examine the business affected by the rates and determine how much it could afford to pay and levy a rate accordingly. In other words, the only rule is the familiar one that the railroad will levy as high rates as the traffic will bear. Those things are all involved in the existence and continuance of the Commerce Court.

Some Senators say we ought not to consider this matter on an appropriation bill. It is the only way we can effectively consider it. The ordinary objections which pertain to the consideration of general legislation on appropriation bills do not apply to this case, because this question has been before the Senate and before the committee having jurisdiction over it ever since this session of Congress convened. Hearings have been had upon it in the Interstate Commerce Committee. The matter is now pending, and a motion to discharge that committee is before the Senate.

The Commerce Court is not only useless, but it is a positive detriment to the necessary regulation and supervision by the Government of railroads, and we should abolish it on the first opportunity that occurs.

These sections of the appropriation bill which not only have the effect, but do expressly abolish the Commerce Court, having already been passed by the House, afford a simple and perfectly conclusive opportunity for the Senate to accomplish this purpose. If we should say that we do not want to legislate upon this subject in an indirect way, through an appropriation bill, and confine ourselves to the consideration of a separate measure, it is impossible to tell what the course of that measure would be in its passage through the two Houses of Congress. No man can tell what its fate would be in the other branch of Congress. The other branch of Congress has acted upon the subject matter, and the fact that it is attached to an appropriation bill under the circumstances involved by this Commerce Court question, having been thoroughly discussed in both Houses, is no good reason why the Senate should not act upon it in the same way.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator a question. In view of the fact that we are now called upon by this bill to make necessary appropriations, and among those appropriations, if the court is to continue, to make an appropriation for the court, does not that clearly present the proposition whether the appropriation is to be made, and if the appropriation is not to be made is not this the proper time to abolish the court as the reason for not making the appropriation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator in that regard. I think it would be very poor business to proceed to appropriate money for a court the existence of which was hanging in the balance in the Senate.

There is no reason why the entire matter can not be considered together, both the appropriation and the subject matter of the continuance of the court. The bill to abolish the court, the motion to discharge the committee, and the different sections of the appropriation bill would all then be before the Senate, and they ought to be considered at the same time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise rather to ask a parliamentary question as a preliminary to asking a further question of the Senator from Washington. If the proposed amendment of the committee is rejected, the text of the House bill in regard to this subject will be open to amendment precisely as though there had been no amendment proposed by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I make that inquiry because to me it is quite clear that if we desire to abolish the Commerce Court and to transfer jurisdiction to the district courts generally, the House provision is inadequate. It will not do what it proposes. I therefore wanted to know before we went further whether, if the committee amendment is rejected, we can fashion the House bill in that respect according to the necessities of the case.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in order to leave the matter open, the committee amendment is to strike out that portion which the House has inserted, and if the court is not restored I think there should be a consensus of opinion here narrowed down to an amendment to be put in so that it will go to conference with the other one.

I agree with the Senator. I do not think the provision inserted by the House is sufficient, but as a layman I am going to depend and must depend upon the learned lawyers of this body to take cognizance of it and to help out the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not quite finished. As everybody knows, I am in favor of the abolition of the court, but if we do that we want the district court or some other court to be invested with the power to grant all the remedies which the law now contains, and I want the opportunity to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the district court in the same way precisely as the appeal can now be taken from the Commerce Court; and I do not think that the House provision will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a question. I prefer to complete what I have to say, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. CULBERSON. Only a moment, if the Senator pleases. Has the attention of the Senator from Iowa been directed fully to the House provision commencing at page 157 of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I have read it very carefully.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not know whether the Senator had read it. If so, is he of the opinion that it is insufficient? I refer to the provision on the bottom of page 157.

Mr. CUMMINS. The House bill contains only the provision that the act creating the Commerce Court is repealed and that the jurisdiction now vested in the Commerce Court is hereby transferred to and vested in the district court of the United States.

That is the entire provision. I do not think that that will give to the district court of the United States the remedies which might have been awarded by that court, or, rather, by the circuit court, prior to the act of 1910, nor do I believe that it will give the district court the power to award all the remedies that were provided for in the act creating the Commerce Court. We would have jurisdiction in the district court, but what power the district court would have would be awarded without any legislation at all.

I suggested this point to the author of it, I will say, and, while he thought otherwise, I am very clear that when the lawyers of the Senate come to reflect upon it they will see that if we intend to abolish the Commerce Court we will have to put into this bill some further legislation with regard to the powers and duties of the district court and with regard to the procedure in the district court and an appeal from the judgment of the district court to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not apprehend that there will be any insuperable difficulty in providing for the proper jurisdiction of the court in view of these matters. In case the Commerce Court is abolished, it would be a very simple matter to give to the district court the same powers and vest them with the same procedure that the circuit court had prior to the passage of the act creating the Commerce Court, or if Congress should desire to provide a new method of review of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that is certainly a matter which Congress can readily deal with.

The important thing is to abolish this court. It can not be successfully contended that there was any force back of the suggestion and the pressing of the measure for the creation of this court other than the desire of the railroad companies and those whom they may have impressed with the force of their arguments to escape from the growing power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There was no demand upon the part of the people of this country for the creation of a new court. There was no demand or desire on the part of the people of this country to lessen the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I was present when the bill was introduced in the House of Representatives which contained the clauses constituting this court. The records, both there and outside, show that it was framed after a conference at which 12 railroad officials were present, in the month of August, in the city of New York. The report of the minority of the Interstate Commerce Committee which was made to the Senate called specific attention to those clauses of that act creating the Commerce Court which divested the Interstate Commerce Commission of the control of cases originating out of the commission's orders and vesting that control in the Attorney General of the United States.

The bill provided for an unlimited merger. There are a great many Members of the Senate perhaps who are in favor of abolishing the law which prohibited mergers of competing lines of railroad. If that should be the policy, Mr. President, there will be nothing to prohibit the consolidation of all the railroads in the United States. I do not know of any more favorable opportunity for a great financial enterprise than the consolidation of these various lines, if the law which prohibits mergers is to be stricken down—and one of the purposes of the act creating this court was to strike down that law.

I want to call attention to what the effect of that policy would be. It would be to put under one control 250,000 miles of railroad, 1,700,000 employees, $18,417,132,000 of capital, a business yielding a gross annual income of $2,750,667,000.

The cases which are reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission as of special importance which had been decided by the Supreme Court in the year previous to the last report which they have filed indicate the disposition of the persons exercising and controlling the resources which I have just referred to to use them to the utmost limit to build up certain interests and to destroy others.

One of the powers which are involved in the Commerce Court is the power to prevent discrimination, to prevent rebates, to enforce the law which has been on the statute books for many years, but has never been effectively enforced. That, in my judgment, has been the principal factor in the building up and growth of the greatest monopolies that are doing business in the United States. The principal factor which enabled the Standard Oil Co. to put its rivals out of business was railroad favoritism. The principal means which gives the Steel Trust its advantage over its competitors is railroad favoritism.

The disposition of the railroad companies to squeeze the business of the country to the last limit is indicated by a case which is found in the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which the railroad companies made a certain carload rate which was less than the rate for less-than-carload lots. The shippers, as was perfectly natural, in order to get the benefit of this carload rate, in some instances shipped their goods together, put several less-than-carload lots together in order to make a carload, and a considerable business developed in that line. Certain agencies were called forth and established in the business of getting together less-than-carload lots in order to give the shippers the benefit of the carload rates.

The railroad had no different business or expense to incur upon a carload of freight under those circumstances than if it was all owned by one person. Yet the discrimination, the disposition to extort unreasonable rates, was shown when the railroad companies made a rule that they would not grant carload rates to any shipper unless the entire carload was owned by one person. The case went before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission held that the order was unreasonable and abrogated it. It went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the Missouri River country, notwithstanding the laws against rebates and discriminations, the railroads devised an ingenious scheme by which the elevators were paid charges in the nature of rebates for wheat which was delivered to them from the railroad companies, which were denied to owners of other elevators, the effect of it being to compel all the wheat from a great region of this country to go to elevators upon the Missouri River. This great power has claimed the right, and has exercised it effectively, to build up certain sections of the country and to hold down others.

We appropriate this year something like $34,000,000 to improve the rivers and harbors of the country. The great interior pays the larger part of the taxes necessary for this purpose. The railroads, when these harbors have been improved by the taxes of the people, take advantage of the existence of the harbors to extort an unreasonable rate from interior points upon the ground that the terminal points, where the harbors are, where the greater part of this $34,000,000 has been expended in order to create terminal facilities, afford water competition. On shipments of goods from an eastern point to Pacific coast points the railroads make what is presumed to be a reasonable rate to Pacific coast port towns—the terminal points. For a haul which is 500 miles—and in some instances 700 miles less—the railroad company being relieved of the expense of carrying their goods across a great mountain range, charge 75 per cent more than they do to carry them to the terminal point, basing their privilege of making this discrimination upon the plea that there is water competition at one place and not at another.

All through the long evolution of the law for the regulation of interstate commerce, beginning with 1887, one of the controversies has been upon the point which I have just mentioned, to prohibit the railroads from discrimination against interior points in favor of terminal points, to take away from the railroads the arbitrary power of building up one city and destroying another one, so far as its business is concerned. One of the good things that was put in the law of 1910 was the amendment of the long and short haul clause from the form in which it was in the original act of 1887. It was very clear in its terms as it was amended, and absolutely prohibited the railroads from charging more for the short haul than they did for the long haul where both were over the same line in the same direction and where one was included in the other.

The Interstate Commerce Commission was given power, however, to investigate conditions, and, if the conditions warranted, to relieve the railroads from the effect of this provision. It was to determine whether or not the conditions were the same. The law was perfectly plain. They did investigate it in these cases which were called the intermountain cases. They found that from points in what they called the Buffalo-Pittsburgh line there was very little water competition between those points to points on the Pacific Coast. From Chicago there was still less; from St. Paul there was none at all. It is perfectly evident from the physical condition of things that this finding of the commission was correct. There is no water competition by way of the sea around the Horn on goods shipped from St. Paul to Seattle and Portland and San Francisco as against goods carried over railroads to those points.

The Interstate Commerce Commission made an order doing away with the injustice which the interior points had suffered on this account. They held that from St. Paul points the railroads should not be allowed on account of the alleged water competition to charge more for hauling goods to points five hundred or a thousand miles in the interior than they did to the terminal points. From Chicago they allowed them to charge not in excess of 7 per cent increase; from the Buffalo-Pittsburgh line not in excess of 15 per cent increase. From New York and other Atlantic ports, because they were upon the water and there was a possible competition, they made a difference of 25 per cent in favor of the terminal points on the Pacific coast and against the interior points, although the interior points were the shorter haul.

That case went before the Commerce Court. The Commerce Court in its decision undid the effect of the long-and-short-haul clause as it was amended in the law of 1910.

Now, a certain number of the reckless and extravagant judicial acts of this court have been corrected by the Supreme Court, but there is an infinite variety of questions arising out of the exercise of this enormous control of the transportation of the country. No two cases are exactly alike. No one can foresee what question may arise to-morrow. If the railroads are prevented from oppression and from discrimination in one direction to-day, they will find another means and another device by which to accomplish their purpose to-morrow, to build up some industry in which, perhaps, they are interested themselves, to build up their own company, to build up some city in which they have a financial interest at the expense of another city, its rival. They will find some new device to evade the law and will depend upon this same Commerce Court, if it is continued in existence, to hold their devices valid and legal and to set aside orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission attempting to regulate railroads in the interest of the public service.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to suggest another reason why I think this court should be abolished, if I do not interrupt the Senator by suggesting it at this point?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would be very glad to hear it.

Mr. BACON. Personally, I would not be willing to vote to abolish the court because the decisions were not satisfactory to me. I must have a better reason than that, although, of course, the fact that the decisions of the court have been to a large extent reversed by the Supreme Court would be an evidence of its inefficiency, to say the least.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In every case but one.

Mr. BACON. In every case but one, my colleague suggests. The point I wish to suggest is: That conditions have changed in one very important particular since this court was organized. I was very earnestly opposed to the creation of this court—first, because I thought it was utterly useless; second, because I thought it might possibly do a great deal of harm; and, third, because it mangled our judiciary system in the fact that it provided for judges of the circuit court being taken from their circuits, and by process of detail being brought here and assigned to a different duty from that which was contemplated in their original appointment, and in which they were not only assigned to duties not thus contemplated by their original commissions, but were denied the right to exercise their constitutional powers as circuit court judges.

The point I want to call the attention of the Senate to is, and I think it is a very important matter, that since that time the entire judicial system has been changed by the abolition of the circuit courts, and the machinery which was provided for this court can no longer be made practically available unless we go to the circuit court of appeals and take judges off the circuit court of appeals and bring them here to preside in this court. At the time the law was enacted there were circuit courts and there were circuit judges of those circuit courts. These judges were appointed as circuit court judges, I think, in utter, absolute inconsistency, to say nothing of the unconstitutionality, owing to the fact that the circuit court judges had, under the law, been appointed in each case judges of particular circuit courts, and there was no such thing known to the law as circuit courts with roving commissions. There never had been from the foundation of the Government. Since this law has been enacted and this court established all the circuit courts of the United States have been abolished. If we are going to carry out the scheme at all, it would have to be changed so as to make the district judges come here to hold these courts. I thought I would mention it, Mr. President, because it has not been so far mentioned, that the entire scheme of our judicial system has been changed since this law was enacted, and that the same machinery could not be applied in the carrying on of this court that was originally designed. Without detaining the Senate, I thought I would take the liberty of inserting this right at this place, because it seemed applicable to the point the Senator was on.

I want to say, Mr. President, that when this bill was passed, in the arguments against it I stated as an objection in the Senate that I did not believe there were 10 Senators in this Chamber who favored the passage of that law. I challenged Senators to rise in their places and dispute that statement, and no one disputed it. I still believe it to be a fact that when this law was enacted there were not 10 Senators in the Chamber who, if left to themselves, would have voted for it. It was known as an administration measure, and was voted for simply because it came from the administration. With the exception of very few Senators, this Senate, if left to itself, would have voted overwhelmingly and almost unanimously against the enactment of the law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the facts stated by the Senator from Georgia as to the influences which secured the passage of that law were notorious. The bill was introduced in the House of Representatives, and at the time it was introduced there was a general report, familiar to everyone, that the administration expected Members of Congress to support it, and that it would regard as unfriendly anyone who offered a hostile amendment to it. There never has been a case in the history of the country, in any part of it that I have read or heard of, in which the power of the administration was used to the extent that it was used in the attempt to force that bill through Congress without amendment. Not only was a report common and current that it would be regarded as an unfriendly act to offer an amendment to the bill, but those Members of Congress who did offer amendments to it felt the effect of that threat.

Mr. President, coming right along after the decision of the Supreme Court in the Illinois Central Railway Co. case, in which the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission were fixed, with the influences back of it which have been referred to, the purpose of this act is perfectly evident. It has performed its purpose, and if it continues in existence it will continue to perform that purpose. The concentrating of the judicial power of the Government in one special court, giving it the exclusive jurisdiction over interstate commerce, affords a tempting opportunity to the enormous corporations interested in interstate commerce to influence the character of the appointments to and the conduct of the court. It is perfectly foolish for us to say that in no instance have those interests attempted to do so. In one way or another, whether it is regarded as proper or improper to influence the appointment of judges, to influence the conduct of judges after they have been appointed, it is one of those evils of government which, however much we may dislike to admit it, nevertheless exists. The part of a wise legislature would be to make the conditions so that the temptation would not be offered to the great interests involved to influence the court that is offered by the concentration of the entire jurisdiction in one set of judges holding the court at one particular place.

Mr. President, I read an address made by Mr. Alfred Taylor Thom, a very brilliant and distinguished railroad attorney, before some bar association, in which he argued rather ingeniously and peculiarly that the States of the Union were lawbreakers because they had passed laws regulating railroads which had been declared unconstitutional. He said that it was perfectly patent and obvious that they were unconstitutional; that the States must have known they were unconstitutional; and that the attempt to enforce them upon the railroads was a lawless act. Of course, that is a grotesque notion, and, as was pointed out by a gentleman who replied to him, for one law passed by a State for the regulation of great corporations which had been declared unconstitutional there were eight which had been declared constitutional. If, however, the same argument is to prevail, then this Commerce Court itself is a lawless body, because its decisions have been notoriously unfounded in law. They were so wrong, they were so far from the law, that they immediately created a universal resentment on the part of every disinterested member of the community. If we could conceive that they had been sustained by some high tribunal and remained in effect, remained the law of the land—if by the existence of this court their decisions had been permitted to permanently undo all that has been accomplished in the last 25 years in the way of railroad-rate regulation—the effect upon that respect for the law, which is necessary in any country which depends upon respect for the law by its citizens, would have been disastrous.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator at this time without his consent, but I want to make a few remarks and to incorporate in the RECORD a statement of the cases that have been reversed of the decisions which have been handed down by the Commerce Court.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator want to make a statement?

Mr. ASHURST. Just a brief statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall conclude in a very short time. I should prefer that the Senator would allow me to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, as to the importance of preserving the integrity of the Interstate Commerce Commission—when I say "preserving its integrity" I mean preserving its power, preserving whole its functions under the law—I want to call attention to a report of perhaps the best statistician and expert upon railroad consolidation in the country, Mr. Henry C. Adams, an employee of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as to the tendency of the railroads to consolidate. With consolidation and concentration and of their almost inconceivable power, the railroads are greater than the Government. They are greater in number of employees, greater in resources, greater in their effect upon the conditions of the people of the country. In his letter to the Interstate Commerce Commission, forwarding the data which was called for by resolution of the Senate, the letter being dated January 27, 1908, Mr. Adams makes these significant statements:

It will be observed that the table of June 30, 1904, derives some of its information from unofficial sources. The corrected tables, as of June 30, 1906, are made up entirely from official sources; that is to say, the special and annual reports of carriers to the commission. The fundamental change to be observed during the two years which elapsed between the two reports is a growing tendency toward concentration of railway interests. Practically no cases have occurred where roads have been taken out from under systems of which they were a part on June 30, 1904. On the other hand, large numbers of railway companies which were considered to be independent in 1904 were brought under the control of systems. Concentration has taken place not alone on the financial side through corporate ownership or control, but also on the operating side; that is, many roads which were parts of systems, but were operated separately in 1904, have since lost their identity and have been merged in the main corporation and now make up a part of the mileage of the main stem.

Referring to some tables which he presents, he says:

The significance of this table, as bearing upon the purpose of the resolution of the Senate under consideration, arises from the fact that the ability to appoint a director upon the board of what might otherwise be a competing company is one of the motives which leads a corporation to invest in the securities of another corporation.

Mr. President, the dangers, in view of the tendency indicated by that report, in the continuance of a special appellate tribunal like the Commerce Court are perfectly evident from a consideration of the facts which I am told exist—and they are indicated by the decisions of the court—that some of the judges of the Commerce Court, as a matter of public policy, do not believe that railroads ought to be closely regulated by the Government; in other words, they entertain the old idea, which they have gotten into through the force of habit, that the railroads are largely private institutions, and that it is invidious for the Government to interfere with them as private property. What could be the result of the decisions of a court having exclusive and supervisory control over this great question if, through the power of the interests involved, judges entertaining those views as to the public policy of the question are called upon to perform the functions of the court? It indicates the dangers which lurk in it and which are likely to occur at any time, whether we are relieved from these particular decisions or not.

Mr. President, I do not base my objection to the court upon the particular decisions which have been rendered, although those decisions are of exceeding interest as proof of what these conditions will develop. It is the condition to which I object; it is the creation of a court which necessarily, in the very nature of its existence, has a tendency to destroy the effectiveness of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There can not be any other result. It was intended by some advocates of the bill to have that result. Through all the long course of legislation and the struggle which the Interstate Commerce Commission made to exercise the powers which the people intended to give it we have not yet come to the point where we have passed any law relating to the watering of stock—the overcapitalization of railroads. That indicates how much more there is to be done, how much more power is to be exercised by this court, how many new questions are to come before it when we pass, as we must pass in the near future, a law investing some tribunal with the power to prohibit overcapitalization and to remove the conditions which enable men in the course of 10 or 15 years to accumulate out of the railroad business two or three hundred million dollars in fortunes largely by means of manipulating the stocks and bonds of the companies.

Those questions will have to come before a tribunal of some kind, and it is a matter for administrative work rather than for judicial theory; it is a matter which should be determined by an administrative force carrying out a certain policy defined by Congress, such a body as the Interstate Commerce Commission; and there should be no power of review on the part of the courts other than the power which the Supreme Court said was the only power of review under the law as it existed before the Commerce Court was created, namely, in those cases where the Interstate Commerce Commission had acted without jurisdiction, or where its decisions had the effect of depriving the company of its property without due process of law.

If the power of review of the courts is limited to that, if it is limited to constitutional and jurisdictional questions, what is the need for the creation of this elaborate court, with all of its functions and with all the furniture which has been described and for which appropriations are provided in this bill? If the law be properly construed, there can be put few decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission come before any court for review. If the Supreme Court itself were the only appellate tribunal, I can readily see that certain functions could be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission which would make it perfectly feasible to provide that appeals should be taken from it to the Supreme Court direct. The Supreme Court has held, in Two hundred and eleventh United States, that it is perfectly competent to create a tribunal which is in part administrative and in part judicial; that the judicial and legislative powers can be combined in the same tribunal; and, in fact, they are combined under the law now in the Interstate Commerce Commission. Some of its functions, its hearings and its decisions, are in the nature of judicial powers, while others are in the nature of legislative or administrative powers as the delegated agent of the legislative department of the Government. From those judicial functions appeals can be taken direct to the Supreme Court of the United States, but they would necessarily be few, and, with the limitation upon the power of review, the Supreme Court would not be burdened with them. The principles have been established, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, instead of being emasculated by the creation of this extraordinary court, would be strengthened; its powers would be made more effective by wiping out the long and tedious delay of an intermediate court, allowing its action to rest upon the rule, which has already been laid down by the Supreme Court, in any new cases which originated, except for an appeal direct to the Supreme Court itself.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this is a motion to strike out section 10, and before that motion is put——

Mr. OVERMAN. The motion is not to strike out section 10, but the question is upon the committee amendment which does strike out that section.

Mr. NELSON. That is what I mean—the question is upon that amendment, and before that question is put we have the right to perfect the provision. In that view I move, after the words "United States," in line 1, page 158, the following amendment:

And the procedure in the district courts shall be the same as in the Commerce Court, and the right of appeal from the district courts shall be the same as from the Commerce Court.

So that the provision as an entirety would read like this——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NELSON. I will yield in a moment—so that the provision as an entirety would read like this:

The jurisdiction now vested in the Commerce Court is hereby transferred to, and vested in, the district courts of the United States, and the procedure in the district courts shall be the same as in the Commerce Court, and the right of appeal from the district courts shall be the same as from the Commerce Court.

Those are pretty general terms, but I think they cover what is lacking in the original amendment. I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. All I wanted to invite the attention of the Senator to was the first sentence of section 10:

That the Commerce Court is abolished on and after July 1, 1912, and all laws, in so far as they provide for the establishment of said Commerce Court, are repealed.

That being the case, I suggest—it is a case of first impression only—that the proposition of the Senator does not go far enough. He ought not to repeal a law in one sentence, and then incorporate in the next sentence provisions of that repealed law.

Mr. NELSON. That can be easily obviated by inserting the word "heretofore."

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator that if the law is repealed it is dead, and no procedure can be had under it.

Mr. NELSON. I know; but the law still remains to the extent of the procedure. We state that the procedure in the district court shall be the same that it was in the Commerce Court. We refer to it. The law, as a law for the Commerce Court, has ceased to exist; but we still retain by the phraseology that part of the law relating to procedure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why not make it read that the procedure shall be the same as it was in the circuit court prior to the passage of this act?

Mr. NELSON. I do not think that covers the matter, because my impression is that in the interstate commerce act of 1910 we conferred greater powers upon the Commerce Court in some respects, and the procedure and the right of appeal were somewhat different than in the case of the old circuit courts. My idea is to leave the procedure and the right of appeal in the district courts the same as they have been in the Commerce Court.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Some of the language in the Commerce Court act was different from the law as it was previously, and the Commerce Court took advantage of that language to very much extend its powers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am opposed to the proposition to abolish the Commerce Court.

I realize that at this time, at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Washington, there are very few Members in the Senate Chamber, and probably there will be no more here when I am through, and not being in the habit of talking for the sake of talking or for the benefit of the RECORD, I hesitate to speak now and thus delay the vote which has already been determined in the mind of each Senator, and I will not occupy more time than sufficient to reply briefly to some of the statements made by the Senator from Washington. The only excuse I can discover for those statements having been made is that the persons making them have been entirely careless of the facts or very unfamiliar with the circumstances preceding and attending the legislation creating the Commerce Court.

I desire to give a brief history, which I think I am prepared to give and can give with some degree of authority and accuracy.

In the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, or more exactly, in January, 1905, a bill was introduced in Congress creating a court of transportation. It was largely drafted by Assistant Attorney General William A. Day, by direction of Attorney General Moody and at the suggestion of President Roosevelt. I contributed a humble part to its preparation and introduced it in the House of Representatives. It was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I was a member, and there, after consideration, it was combined with a bill introduced by Congressman ESCH, of Wisconsin, enlarging the powers of the commission, and the consolidated measure was by me introduced in the House. It was favorably reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee and passed the House in February, 1905. This bill created a court in the same way, of the same number of judges with like powers and similar tenure of office, as the bill creating the existing Commerce Court. The judges, when not employed with the work of the court of transportation, could be assigned by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to circuit work, the same as the Chief Justice can now assign the judges of the Commerce Court. About the only difference between the court provision was that under the former bill the President assigned circuit judges to act on the Commerce Court, while under existing law the Chief Justice performs that duty.

As I have stated, this earlier measure passed the House of Representatives in February, 1905, near the close of the session, but it was not reached by the Senate. It was, however, favored by practically all of the advocates of real railroad regulation and control.

At the beginning of the present administration I discussed with President Taft the question of amending the interstate-commerce law, as there was a general demand for additional legislation. The President gave me a letter of introduction to his Attorney General, Mr. Wickersham, and asked me to go over the question with him. I called on the Attorney General, and we thought it desirable to talk with Commissioners Knapp and Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as they had been administering the then existing law and would undoubtedly have some valuable ideas. Subsequent meetings were held, attended, at the request of the President, by Attorney General Wickersham, Solicitor General Bowers, Secretary of Commerce and Labor Nagel, Chairman Knapp, Judge Prouty, and myself. It was getting toward the end of the extra session, and we agreed to meet in New York after the adjournment of Congress in August. We did meet there and in executive session considered for several days various propositions to amend the commerce law. No railroad lawyers attended the meetings and none were consulted.

We unanimously agreed upon a report. Not a thing was included in our recommendations to the President which did not receive the indorsement of the entire committee. I suggested the proposition of a Commerce Court similar to the one I had presented to Congress in 1905. It was agreed to.

After we had concluded our work the Attorney General and the Solicitor General were requested to prepare our report. This they did, and submitted the same to each one of us for our approval. The report then went to the President, and he discussed its provisions on his trip through the West.

Our report took the form of a tentative bill, and finally, after some revisions as to details, I had the honor of introducing this bill in the House.

It has been charged, here and elsewhere, that orders were given by the President that that bill should not be amended. Nothing could be wider of the truth. No such suggestion ever was made by the President or by any member of his administration, to my knowledge. Certainly, none was made to me. In the process of discussion in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House certain changes were suggested in reference to various provisions. I think I am stating the exact truth when I say that no member of the committee offered more or voted for more amendments than did I. The bill was amended and improved. As reported to the House it contained several provisions not found in the original bill; but every one of the original provisions was retained, though some of them were modified or changed. The fullest opportunity was given to amend it, both in committee and on the floor of the House. No restricting rules were applied in any particular.

That bill passed the House by a small majority and after as full discussion as is ever given to a measure in the House of Representatives. It was supposed when the measure was presented that it would expedite the litigation arising out of interstate-commerce cases. It was supported by many of the most ardent friends of Government railroad regulation, men who have been identified with that cause for years, the statement of the Senator from Washington to the contrary notwithstanding, that the bill was supported only by those who were not favorable to Government regulation. I supported it. Other members of the committee who were equally favorable to regulation supported it. In fact, I stood sponsor for it before the committee. I have never before supposed there was any question as to whether or not I was in favor of the regulation of railroads.

But the bill came up and was adopted, as I have said, in the belief that it would accomplish several things. One of them was the expedition of the litigation. Another was to answer the argument which certain Members of Congress had made, viz, that under the old law railroad men were able to take their cases into courts through whose jurisdiction their railroads ran, which courts were supposed to have been favorable to the carriers. It was thought that a special court, having this matter especially in charge, being familiar with all of the incidents relating to the cases and the technicalities which were necessarily involved in such suits, would be able to build up a body of decisions that would be general, well understood, and in perfect harmony.

It was known that under the old system the decisions were not harmonious. It was common knowledge that the district and circuit courts were crowded with work. They had jurisdiction over all kinds of cases, but no one court had much experience in interstate-commerce suits. These were comparatively rare. These courts were generally behind with their work, and interstate-commerce litigants were through delay frequently denied justice. The decisions by different judges were widely at variance and uniformity was unknown. The final decisions of the Supreme Court were the only ones of any value. Expedition and uniformity of decisions were imperative. The Commerce Court, it was believed, would accomplish these ends, and I submit, Mr. President, that during the less than two years that this court has been in existence it has abundantly demonstrated the promises of its advocates in these particulars. Cases have been expedited, so that now the average time taken to try a case is less than five months, while theretofore it was frequently five years before a determination could be had.

It has been broadly charged that this court has been a railroad court; that it has been favorable to the railroads. I deny it. I deny that the records disclose such a thing. More than 20 per cent of the cases of which cognizance has been taken by the Commerce Court on appeal from the Interstate Commerce Commission have been cases in favor of the shippers themselves.

One of the recent decisions which the Supreme Court handed down was in a case where the Commerce Court sought to review a case which had been decided against the shipper instead of the railroad, and the Supreme Court held that the law did not contemplate that there could be an appeal by a shipper; that it was only when a case went against the railroads that an appeal could be taken. The Commerce Court has held that the law ought to be amended so as to give the same right to shippers that is accorded to railroads. It would seem to be a natural suggestion. It may have exceeded its authority in this particular, but there was no way to find out whether they had the right exercised, except to have the Supreme Court decide. Surely no shipper was injured by this decision, and if the court was trying to serve the railroads it had a poor way of demonstrating its friendship.

Senators are complaining now because some of the decisions of the Commerce Court do not suit them. Gentlemen may say what they will; there is no doubt in the observing man's mind that some men are opposing the court because they do not like some of its decisions and therefore would abolish it.

Shall we complain because the Supreme Court reverses the Commerce Court? Why, that is the way to determine the principles of the law, and at the same time the higher court protects any errors made by the inferior one. Already the course of the Commerce Court has been made clearer and its great usefulness is surely demonstrated. So it seems to me that a court that has been in existence only a little over a year, and which has been equipped with all of the paraphernalia and all of the furnishings that are necessary for a court, should not now be abolished before it has had time to demonstrate fully its usefulness.

The provision of existing law which assigns the Commerce Court judges for work in the circuits is of highest value. It has been so demonstrated, and if it were not for these judges others would have to be created or else the wheels of justice in many courts would become clogged. I do not know what the experience of the Judiciary Committee here has been; but when in the House we were constantly confronted with the fact that there were many circuits in this country that did not have sufficient judges to keep abreast of the litigation pending before them. These commerce judges, as I have stated, are now assigned to the circuits where they can be most useful, where they are actually needed; and the usefulness of that provision has been demonstrated many times during the last year and a half.

So it occurs to me, Mr. President, that when we strip this matter of all prejudice, when we look at it squarely as a law that has been enacted and has been in existence only a few months, we ought not now, at this time, to abolish the court and disarrange the suits which have been begun and are pending and turn them over to the courts somewhere else to be tried. Furthermore, we can not be sure of the status of commerce cases if the House bill provisions are adopted. I do not think that anyone is able to tell what situation we will be in if we destroy the Commerce Court as is proposed to-day. It will be well to consider this matter with more wisdom and deliberation.

Another thing, Mr. President: It is charged here, though without specifications—no bill of particulars having been filed, but simply the bald statement is made—that this court has departed from the original notions which surrounded it when it was created, and has issued the writ of injunction in reference to rate cases more frequently than that writ was issued under the old system.

I submit that the writ of injunction in reference to rates has issued but three times since the court was created, one temporary and two permanent injunctions; and I assert that if you will examine the history of the cases that were tried under the old system, and compare it with the history of cases that have been tried in the Commerce Court, you will find that under the old plan more appeals were taken and more reversals were had, in proportion to the number of cases, than have been had under the Commerce Court system.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact, reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that in 7 out of 10 cases that were really in controversy and amounted to anything the Commerce Court granted preliminary injunctions. As I understand, the Supreme Court has now set aside 6 of those decisions, there remaining only 1 that has been sustained.

I want to call the attention of the Senator to a further matter about the history of the bill creating the court, if the Senator will allow me. I refer to the fact that as the bill came to us, prepared by the Solicitor General of the Department of Justice, and I think as it came before this body from the House, it contained two sections practically undermining and destroying the antitrust law.

We were obliged here in the Senate to emasculate those provisions and take them out of the bill. Otherwise it would have undermined the interstate-commerce law. Am I not right that the bill came in that way from the committee here, and did we not strike it out here in the Senate? One amendment was stricken out on my motion and one by the then Senator from Alabama, who is now deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1911.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside until a vote can be had upon the pending appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina, as the Chair understands, asks unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business until the pending appropriation bill is disposed of. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the provision to which the Senator from Minnesota referred is not a provision in reference to the Commerce Court. I have been discussing the Commerce Court. I will, however, for the moment digress long enough to discuss the proposition to which the Senator has referred. By the way, it was a proposition which was contained in the national Republican platform adopted at Chicago, it was a proposition contained in the Democratic platform also, to the effect that agreements between railroads in reference to rates should be permitted, subject, however, to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The provision as we adopted it was according to that proposition. It has been known that agreements between railroads are necessary, and it was thought best to have them made in the open and subject to the approval of the commission. But this original provision was struck out by the House before it reached the Senate.

I wish to say further to the Senator from Minnesota that already at this session of Congress there have been propositions pending in good faith before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the effect that such agreements shall be permitted to all corporations. Yes, there was a provision changing the antitrust law in accord with the express declaration of the people in two national platforms. But I am discussing the Commerce Court proposition.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In this immediate connection, did not the act provide with reference to mergers that the Commerce Court had jurisdiction to allow mergers upon application made to it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, yes. That opens another door.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only called attention to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We will not stop with attention being called to it merely, because the bill did not provide in the way the Senator from Washington suggests. It needs a more complete understanding in order that it may be presented intelligently.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We need the whole story of the provision to which the Senator refers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator entirely in that regard, but the question I asked was with reference to the Senator's answer to the Senator from Minnesota stating that he was discussing the Commerce Court, which has no relation—at least I assume that that was the intimation—to the allowance of mergers, and it was involved in the jurisdiction of the Commerce Court and in the appeal.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The provision to which the Senator from Washington refers was a provision which provided the very thing which the Senator has discussed to-day, namely, a prohibition against the merger of competing lines of railroad. That is new legislation, understand. No existing law covers the matter which was sought to be reached in the bill of 1910. It was proposed in that bill that no railroad should be permitted to own any interest in a competing line; and the question then arose as to what is a competing line, what is a substantially competing line. It is a difficult question. Most men believe that a railroad should own or control a competing line. The former bill attempted to prevent the combination of competing roads, but realizing the magnitude of the question after prohibiting such combinations it provided that a carrier proposing to buy another railroad could go into court and leave the question as to whether the line which it was proposed to purchase was a competing line within the meaning of the law. We felt that this course was wise and just, especially as we provided in express terms that no act prohibited by the Sherman antitrust law would be legal.

The provision covered only cases not offending the antitrust law. This proposition is now most strenuously advocated by many good men whom even the Senator from Washington would not claim were not sincerely in favor of effective railroad regulation. This, understand, was new legislation. It was a proposition in some way to control this question of acquiring a competing line by its competitor. But some Senators and Representatives thought it was not right and that somehow or other there was a wrong motive in the administration for wanting to do this particular thing. They preferred to do nothing and leave existing wrongs untouched rather than try a remedy proposed by the administration. They preferred to allow the merging process to continue.

Mr. BURTON. That is going on all the while.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Surely, as the Senator from Ohio states, that merger is going on all the while. We proposed to stop it, and to allow that question as to whether they were competing to be determined by the courts, and in attempting to do this the friends of the measure were insidiously charged with working in collusion with the railroads.

Mr. President, I have talked longer than I expected to talk on this subject, but I have felt that an unprejudiced view of this case and of this proposition would show that it is best to allow this court to continue and let the Supreme Court decide and determine these cases on the appeals as they come up. Let the court remain and in time the people will think as highly of it as they do now of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not believe that there is any public demand for its abolition. I do know that the business men who are acquainted with its objects and workings approve it, and it should not be destroyed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not desire to give any extended attention to the merits of the Commerce Court, but I do wish to express my very decided opposition to disposing of such a question as this on an appropriation bill. An appropriation bill has its proper field and function, namely, to provide money for the conduct of the Government. The proposition before us purposes to include in a bill making appropriations for salaries the abolition of a form of governmental activity created by solemn statute.

It is very easy to see where this will lead. Every appropriation bill includes a number of provisions for the support of various agencies of the Government. Possibly in times of excitement it may be necessary to accept the discontinuance or abolition of a form of Government service advocated by one House or the other or else lose the whole bill. That, however, is not the orderly method of procedure.

Mr. President, I concede that there may be some connection between general legislation and appropriations, and that in some cases a function of the Government may be modified by provisions in appropriation measures, but that should not be extended so as to wipe out of existence a court or an important administrative or legislative agency.

There is still another potent objection to legislating by means of appropriation bills—that a rider having the most far-reaching consequences may be inserted without awakening general attention. On other appropriation bills of the present session of Congress the Senate has shown a disposition to reject legislative items tacked onto this class of bills, and I sincerely hope that, regardless of the merits of this court, the same course will be pursued here.

I can not too strongly forecast the result of including in these bills substantive legislation. It is manifest that the functions of other committees will be entirely eclipsed by those of the Appropriations Committee. It will be found much easier to enact or repeal a law by placing it upon an appropriation bill than by mature and independent consideration, such as should be given to any proposed measure.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words in regard to this Commerce Court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to suggest to him what appears to be an additional reason why we ought not to put upon an appropriation bill legislation of this character? It is legislation upon a subject matter which, if it pursued the regular and ordinary course, would go to a wholly different committee from that which deals with it here, namely, it would go either to the Interstate Commerce Committee or to the Judiciary Committee. It is to be presumed in making up the committees of the Senate the members are selected for service upon those various committees because of their peculiar fitness for the service. To my mind the proposition is very well illustrated in this proposed legislation. We have upon this appropriation bill a piece of legislation which, if it is to go into operation, in my judgment will simply be a hotch potch, because we are dealing not only with a proposition which seeks to destroy an existing institution, but must at the same time put in place of it another institution to carry on the functions; and the latter part, namely, the constructive part of the legislation, has been wholly overlooked. If it should be passed in this form nobody can predict what would result from it.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Utah has stated excellently an additional reason. As I said, the Committee on Appropriations would be vested with jurisdiction on a great variety of matters. A law like this, which should be carefully framed by the Committee on the Judiciary, or other similar committee, might be enacted as an amendment to an appropriation bill, and that, too, entirely without adequate examination. From the standpoint of legislation our laws would lack that accuracy which comes from consideration by the respective committees of Congress. Probably the illustration here is about as bad as any that could be imagined.

Mr. President, I wish to speak very briefly in regard to this Commerce Court. There has been a great deal of discussion in this country, and I think I may say in some other countries, regarding the desirability of special courts, such as patent courts, courts of admiralty and of commerce. The general result, I think, has been the development of subdivisions as part of a more elaborate judicial system.

I recognize fully the objections advanced by some arising from the tendency of specialists not to take that broad view of questions which may be a desirable element of all judicial decisions. Another objection commonly alleged—though I do not believe it is entitled to much force—is that the judges will entertain a certain partiality for those having litigation before them, as a result of which such organizations as the railways or important patentees or great vessel owners will have advantages before the courts possessing jurisdiction over their respective matters.

But it seems to me that the arguments in favor of this court are almost unanswerable. The experience of every lawyer will testify that the judges of our different circuits and also of our different State courts manifest an unusual degree of hesitancy in deciding upon these great questions of transportation. They involve a separate branch of the law, which has assumed the utmost importance and which acquires additional difficulty because of constantly changing commercial conditions.

Instances have been frequent where judges of the United States circuit courts have postponed for weeks, months, and even for years the decision of important railway cases. The first argument for the Commerce Court is the promptness with which decisions can be reached. The court has shown certainly a most remarkable record in this regard. The judges are more ready to decide these questions. It is apparent that a special tribunal organized for this purpose can arrive at much prompter decisions.

Again, Mr. President, there is an undoubted advantage in having here at Washington a special court which deprives the railway company of its power to go before any judge who may entertain a friendly bias and bring up its case in any circuit it may select within the territory touched by its lines.

The most important cases decided by this court, Nos. 50 and 51, relating to the long and short haul, were filed in the month of November, 1911. They were decided promptly, and went to the Supreme Court in February, where they have since rested. Now, what would have been done had it not been for the existence of this tribunal? A suit would have been filed in California or New Mexico or anywhere along the railroad line between Chicago and the Pacific coast. The litigants could have selected their own judges. In filing petitions they could have resorted to that court whose docket was the most congested; and if they felt the case was likely to be decided adversely, they could have selected the tribunal where conditions promised the greatest delay.

It has been said here with a great deal of earnestness that you do not need any such court as this, and it has been alleged that the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission are judicial.

Mr. President, it is contrary to the fundamental idea of our Government to vest in any one official body functions which are at the same time executive, legislative, and judicial. The Interstate Commerce Commission is primarily, as I interpret it, an administrative body with quasi legislative duties, but not with judicial functions. To give all three powers or functions to one body would be contrary to every idea of good government.

The conclusive answer to the claim that the Commerce Court takes away judicial powers from the commission is found in the House bill. It does not eliminate judicial review. True, it does take it away from this court, but it gives it to the district court of the United States with the consequent delay, first, of a resort to the circuit court of appeals and then to the Supreme Court. Even then you have the same judicial review, but by a number of judges with varied opinions colored by the legislation of different States, instead of by one body that can promptly decide cases and send them to the Supreme Court.

Now, it is maintained that this tribunal has usurped the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Supreme Court in its last decision in describing the Interstate Commerce Commission said that it exercises quasi judicial powers. However, that is not very material. I only want to remind the Senator from Ohio that the law prior to the organization of the Commerce Court, as I remember it, permitted an appeal directly from the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States. The law did not require certain appeals to pass through the circuit court of appeals, so that in that respect the procedure was as direct as in the case of the Commerce Court.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Iowa will, however, concede that in actual practice the delay was far greater than the delay in passing through the Commerce Court. I do not, at this moment, recall the provision in regard to appeal, but a number of cases were decided by the circuit court of appeals, so that in some instances they certainly must have taken intermediate jurisdiction, and the decision of the first judge did not go immediately to the Supreme Court.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio will remember that the former law required the presence of at least three judges for granting an injunction, and as I remember it, where an injunction was granted sustaining the order of the commission that appeal was taken direct to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The law provided, under what is known as the expediting act we adopted at that time, that they could go to the court of appeals. I think they could go directly from the circuit court to the Supreme Court, as the Senator from Ohio has stated, but I know of no cases after we adopted that clause under the Hepburn law, as it was called, where they went to the Supreme Court, but first went to the circuit court of appeals under what is known as the expediting act.

Mr. BURTON. My recollection of that was not of the statute but of certain cases which certainly did pass through the circuit court of appeals before they went to the Supreme Court. That the Commerce Court has taken upon itself the functions which properly belong to the Interstate Commerce Commission I most confidently deny; and to sustain that position I desire to quote from several of its decisions where the law has been clearly stated in the most unequivocal language. In the case of Hooker et al. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, decided July 20 of last year, the court took this view of its powers:

> In this connection it must be remembered, however, that the power to establish reasonable and just rates for the future for the transportation of freight by common carriers is vested by law in the commission and no part thereof is vested in this court, and this court may not disturb the order complained of unless it can be clearly found that it conflicts with the provisions of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing the power conferred has been regularly exercised.

Practically the same statement that was made by Justice White in the Illinois Central case of the jurisdiction of the courts before he was appointed Chief Justice.

The court again said in a case decided on the 11th of December:

> In that case, as in this, the commission found as a fact upon evidence which permitted different inferences to be drawn, that the regulations complained of operated with discriminating effect, and under such circumstances the conclusions of the commission as to matters within its jurisdiction are binding upon the courts.

That is, upon a given statement of facts one inference or another may be derived. The court goes to the extent of sustaining the commission in accepting one of those inferences.

Again, in a case decided no longer ago than the 9th of April, the case of the Norfolk & Western Railway Co. v. United States, the court said:

> It is not for us to say whether the commission has properly attached great or little weight to evidence adduced upon a given point, or whether the conclusion reached by the commission upon testimony as to facts alone shows mistake as to some particular fact not essential or vital to the proceeding; or inadvertency; or is not such a conclusion as this court might have reached. If the particular matter in issue and inquired into was one of fact and a full hearing was afforded, and the conclusion reached is supported by substantial evidence, it will not be nullified by the courts.

But there is a prevalent impression that the decisions of this court have been altogether in favor of the railroads. That certainly is not the case. The decision in which the Supreme Court has in the most decided language reversed their conclusions was one in which the shipper appealed from the commission and the Commerce Court sustained the right of the shipper to appeal.

Mr. President, I do not wish longer to detain the Senate except to say that to abolish this court goes back to an old order of things which was shown to be faulty. Such action would do away with a court which in promptness and uniformity marks a great advance in the relations between the railroads and the public. It would introduce again a régime of confusion and delay. I am ready to go as far as anyone in sustaining the powers of the commission in regulating the railroads. I recognize their power for oppression, their ability to discriminate against one locality, to build up one community, and to stop the growth of another. The commission made great progress in the regulation of railway rates; it has done away with many forms of discrimination; but this measure itself concedes that the courts will still have the power to review the proceedings of the commission, and give railways and shippers alike an opportunity to appeal to a court of law. Whatever criticism may be passed upon this court, it marks a decided improvement upon old conditions and affords an adequate protection for all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in reading one item here this morning as to Judge R. W. Archbald, who was ordered to go to New York to try what is known as the "wire pool cases" on the 9th of June, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] asked me how I knew that Judge Archbald did not expend this money in the way of reasonable expenses. I am informed by a distinguished lawyer that he was only there four days, and that he charged from the 4th until the 31st of July. He lives at Scranton, which is only 146 miles from New York, and he charged, I repeat, from July 4 to the 31st, $210. I have a record here which throws some light on the subject in a statement where Mr. Henry A. Wise was examined. I now read from his testimony:

> The CHAIRMAN. Please state your full name, your address, and your official occupation.
> Mr. WISE. Henry A. Wise; United States attorney for the southern district of New York; my residence is New York City.
> * * * * * * *
> The CHAIRMAN. Will you please describe the so-called wire pool cases, and state to the committee in your own way all you know regarding Judge Archbald's action in those cases?

Without reading further from this testimony, I will go to the testimony when he speaks of Judge Archbald sitting in that case:

> The grand jury had this matter under consideration throughout the months of May and June, 1911, and returned the indictments on the 29th of June. On the 10th of July a large number of defendants were arraigned before Judge Archbald, who was holding criminal court in the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, and at that time those defendants who were arraigned gave bail and asked for 60 days within which to withdraw their pleas and enter such other pleas or make such motions as they might be advised. There was some discussion at that time, and after discussion Judge Archbald fixed the 1st of September as the time within which these defendants must withdraw their pleas or stand by their pleas. On the 11th of July there were other defendants who came in and entered pleas of "not guilty," and on the 17th of July there were others. By the 17th of July practically all of the defendants who could be reached and who were in the United States had been brought into court and had entered pleas of "not guilty" and had given bail and had until the 1st of September to make any other move they saw fit.
> On the 25th of July a large number of the defendants came into court. I had been notified by their counsel that they intended to come in, and some of their counsel had been to see me and asked if I would consent to recommend the acceptance of the plea of nolo contendere, and I had stated I would not recommend it; that they could either stand on their plea of "not guilty" or enter a plea of "guilty." Of course the court had the discretion to accept the plea if it saw fit, but I would not recommend it; that I would oppose it. On that day a number of the defendants came in, and I have the stenographer's minutes of what took place at that time.

It seems that in this case, which Judge Archbald was sent there to try, he was only there four days. Mr. Albert H. Walker, a distinguished lawyer of New York, who was also examined, says he was there one day—on the 31st—according to this record. I do not know how long he was there, but this record shows that the case he was there to try only occupied five days and he lived only 146 miles away. How could he spend $10 a day for that work?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] seems to have inferred that some invidious significance was attached to the statement made by me that the bill which was framed by the Attorney General and introduced in the House of Representatives by the Senator from Michigan when he was a Member of that body was the product of consultations with railroad men. I had no such intention at all. I think it was perfectly proper that railroad men should have been consulted in regard to it. It is perfectly natural that railroad officials and railroad owners should interest themselves in legislation of this kind. What I intended to call to the attention of the Senate was the fact that those interested looked out for their interests, which necessarily are perfectly distinct from the interests of the public. We all know from the natural course of proceedings that they are not disposed, at least, to look out for the public interests, but, on the contrary, are constantly objecting to the public interfering in any way with their business.

As to the fact of whether the railroad officials were consulted in the preparation of the bill, my statement was based upon my recollection of the statements of the Senator from Michigan himself in the debates in the House of Representatives. I have referred to the RECORD, and find in volume 45 of the RECORD, which was that of the Sixty-first Congress, on page 5231, the account which the Senator has just given, in part, of the proceedings leading up to the introduction of this bill in the other House of Congress by the Senator. In that debate the Senator, it is true, stated that railroad men were not consulted or did not enter into the conference previous to the report which was made; but he went on to state that many changes were made in the draft of the bill after the commission had made its report, so that the necessary inference was that railroad men were consulted; and, in fact, it is so expressly stated by the Senator from Michigan in the language which I shall presently quote. The Senator said at that time, he being a Member of the House of Representatives, and the author of the bill, in part, at least, after describing the meeting in New York:

> They agreed unanimously upon a report which was placed in the hands of the President a few days later. He approved it and discussed it on his trip through the West. During our consideration of these questions and prior to the adoption of the report no railroad man was consulted and none had anything to do with it.

That was prior to the adoption of the report—

> The report was prepared by the Attorney General and submitted to each member of the committee for approval before it was delivered to the President. It contained nothing but what had received the approval of every member, and its every principle is incorporated in the pending bill. The report of our committee was afterwards put in the form of a bill—

At the time this report was made, apparently, the bill had not even been drawn up, according to the statement of the Senator, but it was afterwards put in the form of a bill—> not with details worked out, but to show more clearly its effect upon existing law. This bill form, I have no doubt, suggested to the President the idea of drawing a more complete bill which would clearly convey the ideas he wished to express in his message. The committee, as did the President, thought it wise to invite criticism of the proposed measure, and in bill form it could be clearly understood. Shippers representing shippers' organizations from all over the United States examined the measure. Railroad men did the same. The President was trying to get the highest and best information for the good of the country.

So it clearly appears that the bill, even in its first form, was examined by railroad men and that they participated in the criticism of it with the President, who was active in furthering it. There is no legitimate objection to that, and no invidious inference was intended on my part in referring to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I understood the Senator correctly, he stated in his remarks that this was a bill prepared by 12 railroad men in the city of New York. That was the thing to which I objected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think, if the Senator does not change his remarks, he will find that I have quoted him correctly in substance on that proposition, and I repeat that is the thing to which I objected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that statement. I did state, and stated upon information which I had at the time, that there was a conference in New York City, at which 12 railroad officials were present. I was not myself present. That statement may be a mistake, but whether the details are true or not the substance of it is contained in the statement of the Senator himself, that railroad men were consulted and criticized the form of the bill. I did not state that the railroad men framed the bill, but I stated that they were consulted in regard to it. The particular number of them is immaterial or the particular place where they met. I think my information was that there were 12 present, and that they met in New York City.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state that the Senator from Michigan did not state in that speech—at least he has no recollection of any such statement, and there was no reason for his having stated it—that any railroad men were consulted prior to our preparation of the bill or our report, which, as I said, were practically incorporated in the measure before Congress.

Mr. POINDEXTER. At the time the report was made the bill had not even been prepared in its original form.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We were not there for that purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whether any railroad men were consulted before that would be very largely immaterial. Of course this is only interesting as bearing upon the purposes of this court and the interests and motives which actuated its creation. I have no personal quarrel with men, nor any quarrel with their motives, who seek to interpose barriers between the Government and the railroads in the regulation of interstate commerce. I can readily understand that it is a legitimate opinion upon the part of people entertaining it, perhaps influenced by their interest or otherwise—of course that is not the case with anyone in public office—but I am speaking about men connected with that interest. It is perfectly natural that they should entertain different opinions from the opinions which are entertained, or ought to be entertained, by the Government in regard to the matter. Nevertheless their interest exists; they do not entertain those opinions; they are opposed to governmental regulation and to any interference by the Government. And as bearing upon the influence of that opinion and that interest in the formation of this bill—and it is only interesting or pertinent in that connection—the form of the bill with reference to the allowance of mergers—the provisions which were contained in it as it was introduced by the Senator from Michigan, and as it was discussed in the House of Representatives, are interesting and suggestive.

The Senator from Michigan made the assertion, I understand, a few moments ago, that the bill as it was introduced, instead of making provision for mergers, allowing mergers, was in the other direction, that it tended rather to prohibit mergers, and did prohibit them. But the effect of the bill was to allow mergers, because it allowed a means and furnished a tribunal by which they could be validated, which did not before exist. Railroad mergers were not valid; they were prohibited by the Sherman antitrust law as combinations in restraint of trade; but this bill, as it was introduced in the House of Representatives, provided that the question of a merger even between competing lines might be taken before the Commerce Court, and that the Commerce Court could decide whether or not that merger could be allowed. There was a means for allowing it; there was a means for legitimatizing it, which did not before exist; and consequently the assertion which was made not only by one, but by many Members of the Senate and many Members of the other branch of Congress, that the bill had that effect was founded in the clear terms of the bill itself.

Both the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Ohio make the assertion that the special court which was created by this act has not extended the power of review over the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission beyond what it was before the Commerce Court was created. The Senator from Michigan said that the bare skeleton statement that the court has extended them has been made, but that no bill of particulars has been furnished. I made the statement, I furnished one particular in a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee, at which the Senator was present, and I furnished other particulars in a statement in the Senate a few days ago. I will call the attention of the Senator to those particulars now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The case to which the Senator from Washington called the attention of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate I assume he had not read with care, because if he will look over his testimony he will see that he quoted from a statement of the case as submitted to the court, and he presented that statement of the case to the Committee on Interstate Commerce as the final opinion of the court, whereas the court did not find, as the Senator from Washington stated it had found before our committee. I therefore assume that the Senator had not read the case carefully before he testified before the Senate committee. That the Senator did quote from the statement of facts instead of from the court's decisions, I am sure he will agree, if he reads his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no, Mr. President, that is very far from being the fact; so far from it that the entire decision of the court in that case was read and incorporated in the printed report of the hearings before the committee, and it contained the language to which I have referred. I will call attention to that language now. This is a part of the opinion in the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., decided October 4, 1911, No. 47 in the Commerce Court docket, and it can be easily identified. The decision was rendered by Judge Carland. I had the original print of his opinion in full from the Commerce Court itself before the committee. I delivered it to the reporter, and it was reprinted in the copy of the hearings which I have here now; so that there is no misunderstanding about it at all, and it was not anything like that which the Senator from Michigan conjectures. This part of the law was quoted by the court:

That suits to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought in the Commerce Court against the United States. The pendency of such suit shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but the Commerce Court, in its discretion, may restrain or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the commission's order, pending the final hearing and determination of the suit.

That is a part of the opinion quoting the law. The last phrase which was quoted and which I have just read from the law of 1910 was not contained in the Hepburn Act, nor in the act of 1887. I refer to the lines—

But the Commerce Court, in its discretion, may restrain or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the commission's order.

That is new language that was put into the law of 1910 creating the Commerce Court. It apparently escaped the attention of everyone who debated the question in the Senate, notwithstanding the full debate upon it. Apparently reliance was placed upon the general provision which was put into the law to the effect that no greater jurisdiction should be exercised by the Commerce Court than had been exercised previously. These words, however, were left in the law and the Commerce Court seized upon them, made them the basis of assuming unlimited power to issue preliminary injunctions against the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission which had never before been exercised by any court.

When I say "unlimited power," I mean unlimited except by the rules of equity and the common law. In other words, they assumed every power that any court of equity would have to issue preliminary injunctions in any case, and they exercised it against the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This is the language of the opinion of the court:

The word "discretion" used in the law of course means a legal discretion—

Of course it does; every equity court is limited by legal discretion; and, therefore, there is no more limitation in those words in this matter than there is in any other equity court—

The word "discretion" used in the law of course means a legal discretion, a discretion controlled and limited by sound principles of law applied to the facts in each particular case. The principles which govern courts of equity in granting temporary injunctions are well known to the profession and need not be stated here. One of those principles, however, may be stated as follows: Where the case in which the temporary writ of injunction is asked presents questions of grave importance and difficulty, and it appears from the pleadings and affidavits presented upon the hearing for the temporary writ that great damage will result to the complainant if the writ is not granted and he shall finally be successful in the litigation, and on the other hand that the granting of the writ will not cause serious damage to the defendant as compared with the damage which would result to the complainant if the same were not granted, a court of equity will unhesitatingly, in order to maintain the present status, issue a temporary writ of injunction.

That is the law, as stated by them, upon which they proceeded actually to grant the writ of injunction. It is true that it is limited to preliminary injunctions; but preliminary injunctions are an interference with the orders of the commission to such an extent as to deprive those who are interested in the litigation of the benefit of those orders; and, so far as a preliminary injunction goes, the Commerce Court in that case did extend its authority over the Interstate Commerce Commission and assumed as full power as any court ever assumed in any case, whether over the orders of a tribunal or in an original controversy.

But that is not the only instance which I will call to the attention of the Senate of the enlargement of the powers of review by the Commerce Court—and I will be very brief. In the cases that were called the Water-carrier cases the Interstate Commerce Commission itself makes a very clear and correct statement of the principles involved in the decision of the Commerce Court relating to them; and in their report they use this language:

The matter is called to the attention of Congress, because if the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the case has been taken by appeal, should sustain the holding of the Commerce Court, additional legislation would be required if the authority of this commission over the accounts of common carriers is to be of the same value in the future as in the past.

That is another particular in the bill of particulars which the Senator says was not presented. At least it shows the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is based upon a very clear and correct statement and analysis of the facts and of the decisions of the Commerce Court. They say that additional legislation would be required to preserve the same standing of the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to its orders that they had before the creation of the Commerce Court.

Another case to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan as proving that the Commerce Court has enlarged its powers is that commonly called the lemon case. The Interstate Commerce Commission, on page 57 of its report, in reference to this case uses this language:

If the Commerce Court is correct in stating that where the facts are admitted it is for that court to determine whether the rate is unreasonable or the discrimination undue, then ninety-nine one-hundredths of the orders of this commission can be reviewed upon the question of fact by the courts.

In other words, they completely revolutionized the jurisdiction of the courts over the Interstate Commerce Commission in saying that where the facts were admitted, which, as the commission says, is ordinarily the case—in most instances there is no dispute about the facts in rate cases—the Commerce Court assumed the jurisdiction to review the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, to use their own language, the power of review of the Commerce Court would cover ninety-nine one-hundredths of all the cases before the commission, whereas the law as it was laid down a very short time before the bill creating the Commerce Court was introduced provided that the courts could not review the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission except where there was an excess of jurisdiction or where the order amounted to the taking of property without due process of law.

There is one more proposition to which I want very briefly to refer, and that is the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], that it is necessary to have a tribunal consisting of experts to deal with rate questions; that judges of general jurisdiction are occupied in other matters and with comparatively few cases relating to interstate commerce; that they are not experts and have not the business before them to make them experts. The vice in that argument, Mr. President, is that what we are aiming to do, or ought to do, is to relieve the courts of any jurisdiction to deal with questions requiring expert knowledge of interstate commerce. There was no occasion for any court of expert knowledge upon that subject under the rule laid down by the Supreme Court before the creation of this tribunal. The only questions that could come before the court in those cases were the lack of jurisdiction and the abuse of its authority, constitutional questions, not questions of fixing rates. On the contrary, the Supreme Court had held that as to questions relating to the fixing of rates and questions relating to the conduct of the business of the railroads the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission were final. That is the expert tribunal which meets the needs that are pointed out by the Senator from Ohio. His argument is good so far as the creation of such a tribunal is concerned; but when he proposes to go further and to create another such tribunal, giving it superior and supervisory powers over the first one, then he absolutely destroys the effect, as has so often been said, of the original rate-making power.

Some one has said, I think it was in a debate here, that even the directors of the railroads know nothing about making rates; that the railroad presidents know nothing about making rates upon their railroads. They do not deal with those details of their business, but they have experts who deal with them, and in the great railroad systems they do not consult the rate makers, or whatever they are called, as to schedules of rates, the classification of freight, but such matters are left with those special officers. So the courts, in supervising the action of an administrative tribunal like the Interstate Commerce Commission, do not need to know the detailed business of operating trains, supplying cars, classifying freights, the difference between carload and less-than-carload rates, class rates, and commodity rates—that can be left to the experts and the administrative tribunal constituted for that purpose. The courts should confine themselves to questions which do not necessarily involve expert knowledge of that kind.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall vote to abolish the Commerce Court. The chief argument advanced for the creation of the Commerce Court was that it would greatly facilitate the disposition of cases in which the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission affecting railroad rates were appealed from, and that this would lessen the burdens of the shippers of the United States.

The passage of the interstate-commerce law, with its various amendments, has always been intended and supposed to have been primarily in the interest of the shippers to the end that it would in some measure tend to curb the greedy aggression of the railroads of the United States in the matter of exorbitant rates. Unfortunately, however, the result of the creation of the Commerce Court is that the shippers have not been the beneficiaries, but the railroads have. The usefulness of a court is determined by the character of its decisions. The court must be measured by its results. The net result of a year and a half of the existence of the Commerce Court is that over three-fourths of the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission in favor of the shippers and against the railroads have been overruled by the Commerce Court, whereas prior to the creation of the Commerce Court a large majority of the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission which were appealed from were sustained by the courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, to which these decisions were carried. The Interstate Commerce Commission has never been unjust to the railroads of the United States, and has always been just and fair to the shippers. The great trouble with the Commerce Court is that the judges seem in some manner to have been deluded into the belief that they were appointed for the sole purpose of curbing the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commerce Court has been absolutely of no benefit to the people of the United States. The cost of the maintenance of this court is from $75,000 to $100,000 each year. It is very significant that the shippers of the United States are not opposing the abolition of the Commerce Court.

This court, therefore, having so signally and so flagrantly failed of its purpose, having shown itself to be the especial friend of the railroads, having produced no benefit to the shippers and consumers, while costing the Government, as it does, a large sum of money annually for its maintenance, should be abolished. Even as a matter of retrenchment and reform this useless tribunal should be abolished.

I desire at this particular time to read an excerpt which I have just clipped from an article in the American Magazine for June, 1912, written, concerning the Commerce Court, by Wisconsin's great Senator [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. The excerpt which I have clipped is as follows:

And in 1910 the next railroad legislation which really got before Congress was the so-called Commerce Court bill, though the establishment of a Commerce Court was only one of its provisions. That bill as it came from Attorney General Wickersham, with the approval of President Taft, was, in all the history of railroad legislation, the rankest, boldest betrayal of public interest ever proposed in any legislative body. If it had been passed as introduced, it would have lost to the people all the ground that had been gained in the long struggle with the railroad corporations.

* * * * * * *

The fangs in this bill as originally introduced were, with the exception of the Commerce Court provisions, all drawn by the fight of the progressives.

I think I ought to add, assisted by Democratic Senators.

We could not, however, prevent the establishment of a Commerce Court which is in a position to destroy, and is now actually destroying, the work of the most progressive Interstate Commerce Commission the country has ever had.

And Wisconsin's great Senator further adds these pungent words:

It is scarcely possible to speak of the course of the administration upon this legislation in temperate language.

I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an excerpt from a leading publication, the National Weekly, which contains a résumé of the decisions of the Commerce Court affecting railroads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WHAT IS THE COURT FOR?

The Interstate Commerce Commission consists of seven members who are paid $10,000 a year apiece. In addition the commission had a small regiment of examiners and experts, clerks and subbureaus. The railroads of the country take from the people in excess of three billions per year, a sum greater than the combined taxation of our National, State, municipal, county, and other governments. The commission was organized to see that this enormous revenue was raised fairly and not with outrageous discrimination toward individuals or companies or toward communities, as had hitherto been unrestrictedly the case.

The Commerce Court was organized purely to review the law findings of this commission; it had no right to question any finding on the facts. This latter restriction of the powers of the Commerce Court has just been rigidly upheld by the Supreme Court; and yet in the face of the plain wording of the law, the plain intent of the act, this body of usurping judges upset the rulings of the commission in practically every important case out of the first 24 which came before it, and this not on questions of law but purely on findings of fact.

When the Commerce Court was organized it was urged that its purpose was wholly obstructionary and designed simply to nullify the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. * * * This has been wholly confirmed by the action of the court in interfering with the commission in every way, even in plain defiance of the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States. The record of this court of nullifiers in the first year of its existence should surely mean its prompt abolition. Here is its record:

First two decisions. San Francisco and Los Angeles switching cases: The commission held that as it is the practice of the railroads to impose no switching charge on an industry on its own tracks when team-track delivery was not called for, and that as this was true of 10,000 stations in the country an exception should not be made of San Francisco and Los Angeles. Order restrained by temporary injunction of the Commerce Court, Mack dissenting.

Next two. Cincinnati rate case: Shippers, through board of trade, sought a lower rate than that fixed by the commission from Cincinnati to Chattanooga. Demand denied by the commission. Appeal to Commerce Court; injunction denied by the court; i. e., the railroads sustained.

Fifth. Lemon rate case: Final decree by Commerce Court reversing the commission's order that the rate on lemons should be no more than $1. This order was based upon the proposition that the haul of lemons was on the average 400 miles less than the haul of oranges, and that the railroads themselves made the orange rate $1.15.

Sixth. The Procter & Gamble case: Right of the railroad to charge demurrage on private freight cars. Court upheld the commission in deciding that the railroad was right.

Seventh. Union Stock Yards: Commission held that this and the Chicago Terminal Railroad were one and the same thing, and that the stock yards could not give a bonus of $50,000 to a meat-packing plant in Chicago because this was, in effect, a rebate. Injunction by Commerce Court.

Next four cases. Goodrich Transit and White Star Line cases, involving the right to prescribe the accounting system on boat lines on the Great Lakes which did a port-to-port business. Injunction by Commerce Court, which leaves the commission with no basis on which to fix rates or to stop rebating.

Twelfth. Omaha bridge case, regulating the passenger fares. Commission's jurisdiction sustained!

Thirteenth. Omaha Commercial Club case, involving the lumber rates. Position of commission sustained!

Fourteenth. Federal Sugar Refining case: The trust refineries get 4½ cents for lightering their sugar to Jersey City. Held by the commission that the same should apply to the Yonkers refinery. Injunction by Commerce Court. This means about $500,000 a year advantage to the trusts.

Fifteenth. "Restricted rate" case: Held by the commission that carriers had no right to make a different rate on coal for use on railroad or street car lines or by factories and houses. Injunction by Commerce Court.

Sixteenth and seventeenth. A rate case to Durham, N. C., and the rate on precooled shipments of citrous fruits from California. Injunctions refused.

Eighteenth. Nashville grain cases: Held by the commission that transit privileges could not be granted to Nashville brokers in grain and refused to Atlanta brokers. Decision reversed by Commerce Court and injunction granted.

Twentieth. Meeker case: Coal rates to tidewater. Injunction refused.

Twenty-first. Salt Lake City rates from Missouri River. Temporary injunction declined.

Twenty-second. Next three cases, known as the Fourth Section cases, involving intermountain cities, the right to charge a higher rate to them from the Missouri River than to the coast. Commission enjoined.

Total of 24 cases. In one important case, the Salt Lake City case, the position of the commission was sustained and in five other trifling cases of little interest.

In the remaining 18 temporary injunctions or final decrees were granted or the railroads' position upheld.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Shively
Bacon	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bourne	Foster	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Gardner	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bryan	Gore	Oliver	Stephenson
Burton	Gronna	Overman	Sutherland
Catron	Heyburn	Page	Swanson
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Paynter	Tillman
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Percy	Townsend
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Warren
Crawford	Jones	Poindexter	Watson
Cullom	Lodge	Pomerene	Wetmore
Cummins	Lorimer	Rayner	Williams
Curtis	McCumber	Reed	Works
Dillingham	McLean	Root

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 158, line 1, after the word "States," insert a comma and the following:

And the procedure in the district courts shall be the same as heretofore in the Commerce Court, and the right of appeal from the district courts shall be the same as heretofore from the Commerce Court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, which has been stated.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Minnesota think it would be better to settle the main question whether or not we are to continue the court? Would it not be better to lay aside the amendment until that is settled?

Mr. NELSON. No; the committee amendment is to strike out section 10. If it is stricken out, that is the end of it. We have a right to perfect the text before your motion to strike out is put, and I aim by this motion to perfect the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I make no point against it, except to ask if we should not have first an expression as to whether or not we shall have the court?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on a question of order, if the Senate votes down the motion to strike out, the Senator from Minnesota can not then offer his amendment, because the Senate will have agreed to those specific words.

Mr. WARREN. I make no point of order. I simply make the suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. OVERMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of abolishing the Commerce Court, as I was earnestly opposed to its creation. But I differ so widely from some of the suggestions that have been made looking to its abolition that I feel that I must state the reasons which prevail with me.

I do not believe the members of the Commerce Court have been influenced by improper motives. I believe that, according to their lights, they have endeavored to faithfully administer the law. But I say now, as I said long ago, that a court superimposed as this is upon the Interstate Commerce Commission will very quickly become either its advocate or its enemy. As I understand human nature, it is wholly impossible for a special tribunal, having no duty whatever to perform except to criticize or to commend the action of another governmental department, to maintain an impartial attitude toward that subordinate or inferior department.

I prophesied when the court was created that, no matter how good its judges might be, no matter how earnestly they attempted to perform their duties, the thing would happen which the history of the court has shown has happened.

I believe five of the decisions of the Commerce Court have reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and all of them have been reversed. It has rendered other decisions which may not be reversed. I can not say as to that. But from the beginning it has taken, as it seems to me, a critical attitude toward the Interstate Commerce Commission that inevitably has led it into the error which has been so forcibly and so often pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States.

This was my principal objection to the Commerce Court. But there was another objection—not so vital, but nevertheless entitled to a great deal of consideration. We did not need the Commerce Court. We have had put into commission five men, drawing immense salaries, with, of course, the equipment that goes with the court, without any necessity whatever.

I do not deny that the cases that have come before the Commerce Court have been decided with a little more celerity than the cases that were theretofore decided by the circuit courts. But the history of the whole subject prior to the creation of the Commerce Court conclusively established that the cases brought to enjoin the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission were disposed of with reasonable speed. There was no undue or unnecessary delay. There was no unusual delay. It was apparent in 1910 that the circuit courts had disposed of these cases much more quickly than they had disposed of other cases of a general character. And when you consider that the proportion of cases in which the order of the commission has been suspended and neutralized by the Commerce Court is vastly greater than the proportion in which that result happened before the establishment of the court, I doubt whether it can be said that there is any more speed or celerity than before in the final disposition of the cases.

If you maintain this tribunal, superimposed as it is upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, you will always have just the result that has happened during the last year and a half—it matters not who may occupy these places. I do not appeal for the abolition of the court because of the men who, for the time being, occupy positions on the court. If I were opposed to it only on account of the incumbents, I would know that time would speedily remove my objection in that respect, for these judges go, one by one, year after year, from the Commerce Court to the circuits, and other judges come in to fill their places.

But the influences—and they are as inevitable and as irresistible as nature itself—that have brought about the results that we have observed in the last year and a half, will be equally effective when these places are filled by other circuit judges.

We ought not to perpetuate the system. It is bad, and its consequences must always, as it seems to me, be harmful to the people of the United States. This jurisdiction ought to be exercised by those judges who are appointed to administer justice generally and not to administer justice in a particular class or kind of cases. In that way, and in that way alone, as I believe, will we be able to maintain an effective judiciary, one in which the people of the country can repose absolute and unlimited confidence.

I have regretted very much that I am compelled to meet the question upon an appropriation bill. I wish that it were here in an independent measure. I think, however, that this attempt is not so censurable as many others in the way of legislation upon appropriation measures. It seems to me that when Congress comes to provide for the affairs of the Government, if it does not desire that a particular function of the Government shall be continued or a particular system maintained, it has a perfect right within the fair bounds of legislation, to say that we will appropriate no more money for the maintenance of that function or that system. The House has so done in this case, and the only difficulty about it is that when Congress refuses to appropriate for the maintenance of the Commerce Court it then becomes necessary to make some arrangement with regard to the cases which would otherwise be brought in the Commerce Court, and that compels the further provisions of this bill with respect to the transfer of the cases now pending and the bringing of future cases of like kind in another tribunal. I think that is a justification for the provision of the House bill, although, I repeat, I would be very glad if this were so separate from the other legislation that we could perfect it in the way in which it ought to be perfected.

The amendment just adopted, presented by the Senator from Minnesota, has met several of the difficulties which I suggested this morning. We now have the procedure that we applied to the Commerce Court applied to the district court, and we have the same remedies by appeal.

There is one thing, however, which is still lacking. I have not had time or I have not had the opportunity to frame an amendment to the bill as it passed the House in that respect, but it must be cured if it becomes a law. As you all know, it was not within the power of a single judge to issue an injunction restraining or suspending the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission prior to the creation of the Commerce Court. If we now abolish the Commerce Court and return all these cases that are pending and authorize others to be brought in the district court of like character, then a single district judge can issue an injunction suspending or setting aside or enjoining the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am not willing to confer that power on any single man, especially as the district in which the suit will be brought is largely at the pleasure of the railway company complainant.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that we might vote this afternoon upon the committee amendment which strikes out the House provision abolishing the court and then probably let it go over until to-morrow, so that the Senator may frame his amendment if we determine to abolish the court.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to do that, except that I have been advised from remarks made by Senators who are far better parliamentarians than I that if the committee amendment be voted upon and if it be rejected the vote is an adoption of the House text precisely as it is.

Mr. WARREN. With the addition of the amendment which has been agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I assume, however, that the difficulty I have now brought to the attention of Senators could be removed after the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was going to suggest that the bill would be open to amendment after it reaches the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure, if these cases are to go to the district court, Senators will not want to give a single district judge, selected oftentimes, and, I think, in the greater number of instances, by the complainant—the railway company—the power to issue an injunction. I think we must make a provision that other district judges shall be called in, and that not less than three shall sit upon the hearing for a preliminary injunction.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. SMITH of Arizona addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that with my amendment incorporated in section 10 it practically leaves that section in conference, so that the matter to which the Senator refers can be adjusted in conference. Without my amendment, if we adopted the section bodily it could not be done, but with that amendment incorporated in it the whole section will be in conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that, but I am not quite ready to intrust it to the conference. Without doubting at all the ability and the desire of the conferees to do exactly right in the matter, I would rather the Senate itself would attach such provision in that respect as it believes necessary to protect the shippers of this country.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator. I am in hearty sympathy with the statements of the Senator as far as I could hear them, but I several days ago doubted as to whether it would be germane to this particular bill. However, I have drawn this language which I hope the Senator may consider and perhaps improve:

That hereafter any rate fixed by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be and remain the maximum rate that can be charged by any railroad or other common carrier against which such order is made, until a final judgment or order of a court of competent jurisdiction, after a full hearing on the merits, shall change or modify such order of said commission: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent the said commission from modifying or changing such rate from time to time as justice or necessity may require.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Arizona, of course, knows that there has waged over the question which he presents in his amendment a very long debate, and that there is much difference of opinion with regard to the power of Congress to enforce the rate established by the commission until final trial of the case. I do not express any dissent from the views of the Senator from Arizona, but I would very much rather see the district judge to whom application is made for injunction reinforced by the presence of at least two other district judges before any injunction is or can be granted.

I have mentioned that, Mr. President, not in order to delay a vote upon the amendment of the committee, but rather as notice that before the bill shall be passed beyond the Senate I will present in some form an amendment that will cover the idea I have just stated.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that it is seriously contended that Congress is without power to pass a law providing that injunctions shall not be issued against the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission until the hearings before the court have reached a certain stage provided by Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know how the Senator from Missouri understood it. I do not remember just how I stated it, but the law is this: Of course, neither Congress nor the Interstate Commerce Commission can take property without due process of law. If the Interstate Commerce Commission were to establish a rate which required the railway company to render a service without due compensation it would be vulnerable to the constitutional objection and such an order would be in violation of the Constitution.

The only question that remains is when can that question be raised. There are lawyers who insist that we can take from the courts of the United States the authority to issue any temporary injunctions and leave whatever remedy the party complaining may be entitled to until a final trial upon the merits. There are other lawyers, however, who claim that the right to issue an injunction in a proper case is a part of the jurisdiction or power of the court which Congress can not take away. I did not express any opinion as between those contending principles.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it would seem to me that the right of Congress to prescribe the kind of showing which must be made before a court in order to authorize that court to act is exactly the same character of limitation as the one proposed by the Senator when he suggests that the right to issue temporary injunctions shall be taken from any one judge and only be exercised when several judges are called together. Indeed, it would seem to me that the right of Congress to regulate the procedure and prescribe the character of evidence which must be produced before a court can act is more certainly within the power of Congress than a provision which requires several judges to be called together, because in the one case you simply legislate with reference to the procedure before a court, whereas in the second case you in effect deprive one of the courts of the United States of its jurisdiction entirely and substitute for it a jurisdiction in several judges called together in banc.

I am not saying this in opposition to the position of the Senator from Iowa, because I am heartily in accord with the thought that injunctions should not be improvidently or recklessly issued against the orders of this great commission.

Mr. President, if the power of injunction must be vested anywhere to withhold the orders of this great national commission, ranking, as it does, in the point of ability of its members, I think I can say, with any court save the Supreme Court of the United States, these orders should not be set aside except for the gravest reasons. It seems to me the power to enjoin its orders ought to be vested in the Supreme Court of the United States alone, or, perhaps, in the circuit courts of appeals.

While I am speaking to that, I simply want to offer this observation upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. Almost from the first some of the greatest lawyers of this country have sat upon that commission. Judge Cooley, who ranked in intellect and in learning, in my opinion, with any man who has ever adorned the bench of this country, sat upon it. It is a misfortune that the acts of boards created by States, the acts of boards created by the Government, acts of the legislatures which have been fully considered by the members of the general assemblies of the States and solemnly considered and signed by the governors of States, should be set aside by the decree of one man upon an ex parte hearing, sustained frequently by only one or two affidavits.

I trust that if the Senator from Iowa draws an amendment and presents it he will consider at least the propriety of vesting this injunctive power alone in either the United States courts of appeals or the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to limit the scope of the preliminary injunction in a great many cases. I do not intend to try to settle this afternoon just what power we have in that respect. I would be very glad, if we could do it, to require a trial upon the merits before injunction could issue suspending the enforcement of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Whether we can do that is a matter of grave difference among Senators and among lawyers. But all that I want to do at this time is to give notice that before the bill passes from the jurisdiction of the Senate I shall present an amendment that will require at least something more than the judgment of a single man to suspend an order which had been entered through the combined judgment and experience of seven men.

I remind the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], however, of the fact that the present law requires notice of an application for a temporary injunction, and the amendment presented by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] would carry that procedure into the district court, so that the hearing will not be or can not be purely ex parte.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think we should bear in mind that the judicial power of the United States is vested in the courts, not in Congress. Some of the discussion has been proceeding, it seems to me, upon the assumption that Congress could in some way exercise a control over judicial power. It can not direct the manner in which judicial power shall be exercised. Congress is authorized to establish courts and create their jurisdiction, but there is the widest distinction between jurisdiction and judicial power. We can not take away from the courts of the United States the judicial power, and if we can not take it away we can not modify it, because any modification of it is a partial taking. We must bear that in mind.

When we undertake to say that the courts of the United States shall not exercise a judicial power in this case or that, we are running against the constitutional prohibition. There have been at times, perhaps there are now existing, two schools of legal thought upon this question, but none of them go so far as to contend that Congress can control the exercise of judicial power. We want to avoid anything in this legislation that would seem to be an attempt on the part of Congress to infringe upon that right which is as distinct and as clearly patent in the Constitution as the right vested in Congress to perform legislative powers. We are not the masters of the Supreme Court. We can create courts and give them jurisdiction, but, I repeat, there is all the difference in the world between jurisdiction and judicial power. Jurisdiction brings the courts into existence, and then, being created and in existence, they act under the mandate of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet, as it is often said here, I call attention to the fact that so far as I remember the amendment now under consideration does not provide for a transfer of the records and proceedings of the Commerce Court to the district court. If we were to accept the House provision, then we find in that an attempt to provide for the transfer of the instrumentalities of legal procedure. Neither have we made any express provision here, so far as I remember, in any amendment, for the disposition of the officers of the Commerce Court and we might possibly consider the question of disposing of that furniture.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, without delaying the proceedings I want to call attention to the fact that in the very act of 1910 creating the Commerce Court, in section 17 it is provided:

That no interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of any statute of a State by restrain-ing the action of any officer of such State in the enforcement or execution of such statute shall be issued or granted by any justice of the Supreme Court, or by any circuit court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, or by any district judge acting as circuit judge, upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of such statute, unless the application for the same shall be presented to a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or to a circuit judge, or to a district judge acting as circuit judge, and shall be heard and determined by three judges, of whom at least one shall be a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States or a circuit judge, and the other two may be either circuit or district judges.

Under the judicial code adopted the district judges take the place of our circuit judges. This law is still in force, and the adoption of this amendment would not militate against it at all. The injunctions here referred to are injunctions relating to the enforcement of State statutes or State regulations regarding transportation. It is not general in character. The law in respect to injunction in other cases was left as in the original act. That is my recollection.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Minnesota is entirely right in that. All that I will insist upon at the proper time is that the very provision just cited by the Senator from Minnesota with regard to State statutes shall be made applicable to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator that this is the next to the last section of the act creating the Commerce Court; that it acted as a restriction on that court and must continue to act as a restriction on the district court if we confer jurisdiction on it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Minnesota did not quite understand me. The statute, however, does not cover the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The statute only covers State statutes. I think we ought to be just as careful about suspending the operation of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission as we have been respecting the jurisdiction of a State statute.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, upon the adoption of this amendment I call for the yeas and nays. The question, I understand, is upon the adoption of the amendment of the committee which is to strike out the House provision abolishing the court. Therefore, those who are in favor of the abolishment of the court would vote "nay" on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the amendment be now stated in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair state that there were three separate amendments, which, for the purpose of discussion, were considered together? An amendment to the third amendment was offered and has been acted upon, but following the agreement that was entered into when the bill was first taken up what really should now be voted upon is the first amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the question in reference to the appropriation. If we vote on section 10 and abolish the court, as a matter of course we will disagree to the amendment on page 150, which is the first amendment. The amendment on page 150 is the appropriation for the payment of salaries of the court. I suggest that we take up section 10, which brings up the whole question, and if the amendment of the committee should be adopted, then the question would be on agreeing to the appropriation for salaries of the court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that would be the better way to proceed. If there is no objection, that order will be followed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is suggested by the Senator from Iowa that there is no express provision for transferring the records of the Commerce Court to the district court.

There is a provision in the House bill transferring pending cases. It is also suggested that there is no provision abolishing the office of clerk and marshal of the court. That would probably go along with the abolishment of the court; but, in order to make those matters perfectly clear, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to section 10, page 157, line 21, to insert, after the words "Commerce Court," the words "and all the offices thereof"; and in the same line to strike out the word "is" and to insert the word "are"; also, on page 158, line 4, after the word "cases," where it provides for the transfer of cases, I move to insert "and all the records therein."

Mr. HEYBURN. "Records, papers, and proceedings."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator please send the amendment to the desk?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. I also move to insert, after the word "cases," in line 16, on the same page, the words "and the records of said court."

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest that the language used in other acts is "the records, papers, and proceedings."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 10, on page 157, line 21, after the word "court," it is proposed to strike out the word "is" and to insert "and all the offices thereof are"; on page 158, line 4, after the word "cases," to insert "and all the records therein."

Mr. HEYBURN. It should read, "records, papers, and proceedings."

Mr. POINDEXTER. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, and move that the words "records, papers, and proceedings therein" be inserted.

The SECRETARY. And on page 158, line 16, after the word "cases," it is proposed to insert "and the records of said court."

Mr. OVERMAN. Also "papers and proceedings."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, let us see that we are not making a mistake. We are now proposing to amend something that is not in the bill as it came to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it is in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it is stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate committee has a proposition pending to strike it out, but it is still in the bill. It stays in the bill until it is stricken out.

Mr. WARREN. There is a Senate committee amendment proposing to strike it out, and this is an amendment to the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I see the Senator is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator did not hear what the Chair had announced, but I understood the Senator from Wyoming to say that this was an amendment to the Senate committee amendment. That is not a correct statement. As I understand, these are amendments to the provision as it comes from the House; in other words, exercising the privilege to perfect an amendment before the motion to strike out is put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator correctly states it.

Mr. WARREN. That is true; but technically the committee amendment is merely to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] asks for the yeas and nays upon the question of agreeing to the Senate committee amendment as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NELSON. This is on agreeing to strike out the section. Is that the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion; and an affirmative vote is in favor of striking it out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that an affirmative vote——

Mr. CULBERSON. Regular order!

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. An affirmative vote now, I understand, is in favor of retaining the Commerce Court?

The VICE PRESIDENT. An affirmative vote is in favor of striking the provision from the bill. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I do not see him on the floor, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when the name of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming was called). I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming], who is absent on business of the Senate, on this question is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I have a pair upon this question with the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] upon this amendment. I transfer that pair to the junior senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when Mr. GAMBLE's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is paired with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when Mr. LEA's name was called). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

Mr. GORE (when Mr. OWEN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. OWEN] is necessarily detained from the Senate. As has been stated, he is paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is necessarily absent. On this vote he is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present and free to vote, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is absent. I have been informed that, if he were present, he would vote "nay." I am extremely anxious to vote in this case, but not having heard directly from the Senator from New Mexico, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were present, and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have announced my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]; but I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is paired with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BURNHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If he were present, and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HEYBURN (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, I desire to announce that I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I have been advised that if he were present he would vote "nay," and therefore I have voted. I do not see him in the Chamber, and I have not been personally instructed by him that I was at liberty to vote. I will therefore withdraw my vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdraws his vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I am quite satisfied if the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] were present he would vote the same way as has the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. On the strength of the statement of the Senator from Alabama, I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CRANE] is necessarily absent. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. If present and at liberty to vote, my colleague would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bradley	Gallinger	Oliver	Stephenson
Burton	Jones	Page	Sutherland
Catron	Lodge	Perkins	Thornton
Cullom	Lorimer	Root	Townsend
Dillingham	McCumber	Smith, Mich.	Warren

Burnham	Gamble	Paynter	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Penrose
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Richardson

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment on page 147, which the Secretary will state.

Mr. WARREN. I prefer to first take up the amendment on page 150.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, action will next be taken upon the amendment on page 150, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 150, beginning at the top of the page, it is proposed to insert:

United States Commerce Court: For clerk, $4,000; deputy clerk, $2,500; marshal, $3,000; deputy marshal, $2,500; for rent of necessary quarters in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and furnishing same for the United States Commerce Court; for books, periodicals, stationery, printing, and binding; for pay of bailiffs and all other necessary employees at the seat of government and elsewhere, not otherwise specifically provided for, and for such other miscellaneous expenses as may be approved by the presiding judge, $50,000; in all, $62,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment on page 147, which was passed over.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not know whether exactly the same question is involved in the amendment on page 147, but I should like to have it read, so that Senators may consider it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment on page 147.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that presents a very important question as to whether or not the abolition of the Commerce Court abolishes the judges of that court. It seems that the House thought not, because they have provided here that no further circuit judges shall be appointed until their number shall be reduced to 29, and that thereafter there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges. My own opinion is that the adoption of the House provision as to abolishing the court abolishes the judges.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina. These judges were not created as judges of the Commerce Court, but were created as judges of the United States circuit courts as then established.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that is the question involved.

Mr. WARREN. The question now is whether we wish to reduce the number of circuit judges to 29 as fast as the present judges may die or retire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 147, after line 10, it is proposed to strike out:

No circuit judge shall hereafter be appointed until the whole number of circuit judges shall be reduced to 29, and thereafter there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a part of that amendment I favor entirely, but there is a part of it that I do not quite understand. I ask the attention of the Senator from North Carolina. The law under which these judges were appointed reads as follows:

The President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five additional circuit judges no two of whom shall be from the same judicial circuit, who shall hold office during good behavior and who shall be from time to time designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States for service in the circuit court for any district, or the circuit court of appeals for any circuit or in the Commerce Court.

These five judges are therefore assignable to any circuit by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am aware of that fact, but I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. Therefore, unless we desire to relieve them of their offices—and I do not understand the House bill goes to that extent—it is perfectly clear that they would be assigned to the various circuits. What does the Senator from North Carolina think of the provision that thereafter—that is, after the whole number of circuit judges is reduced to 29—there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not agree to that at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hoped the Senator from North Carolina would not agree to that, because we do not know how many circuit judges we may require as the years go on.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not agree to that; I agree with the Senator. I also think that there ought to be an amendment repealing the section of the law which makes judges of the Commerce Court circuit judges. I understood the Senator from Minnesota was going to offer an amendment which would repeal the provision of law creating the judges of the Commerce Court. I think the idea of the Senate is that these judges ought to be abolished as well as the court.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I had intended to introduce such an amendment. My own judgment is, however, that we had better adopt the House language in lines 11 and 12 down to the word "nine," in line 13. That prohibits the appointment of any more judges until the number is reduced to 29, and then we could strike out the House provision limiting the number of circuit judges to 29, and take up later the question of disposing of these five judges.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned I had it in mind to offer just that amendment, but I do not believe that we should say that thereafter there shall be no more than 29 circuit judges.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I may betray my ignorance in doing so, but how many circuit judges have we now?

Mr. CUMMINS. Thirty-four.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This, then, is a proposal to reduce the existing number from 34 to 29?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is.

Mr. CRAWFORD. How is such a thing as that to be done?

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator does not understand the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. If any circuit judge should die or resign, then it is intended to prevent the appointment of anyone in his place until the whole number is reduced to 29.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This whole number of 34 includes the judges of the Commerce Court.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The existing 34 includes the members of the Commerce Court?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And we have abolished the court so that it leaves these judges to perform the duties of circuit judges under some assignment to the respective circuits; but I have not yet been able to quite understand the proposal to reduce the number of circuit judges from 34 to 29.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that the provision ought to be in the bill at all. We have 34 circuit judges now. If the Commerce Court is abolished, and if one of the circuit judges shall die or resign, then it is for Congress to determine whether we need another circuit judge. The 5 circuit judges who are upon the Commerce Court simply go out into the circuits and take up the general work of those courts.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that now the judges who are doing the work of the Commerce Court are assigned from time to time to aid in the circuits where the judges are overworked. I understand they have been to Arizona and to other States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understand.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, we have 34 circuit judges, 5 of whom are on the Commerce Court, detailed to that court, and while they have been doing the work of the Commerce Court they have also been doing work under assignment in the circuits. It seems to me that this provision in the House bill is far too drastic, because it states that hereafter there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges. Of course, we can correct that by legislation; but is it necessary now to say that? That is the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Obviously not; we ought not to say it.

Mr. WARREN. First, I think we ought to settle whether we want 34 circuit judges and whether there is need for the extra judges in the different circuits. In many of the circuits the work is piled up and the judges are far behind. That being determined, the question is whether you shall retain 34 circuit judges or gradually reduce the number to 29.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If we decide that we do not want the 34 and in a blanket declaration reduce the number to 29, who is going out? There are 34 circuit judges now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Answering the Senator from South Dakota, so far as I am concerned, I do not think any part of this provision ought to be in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. None of them go out of office, as I understand, until they die, resign, or retire; but as they retire the number is finally reduced to 29, if the House provision is to govern, because no other judges will be appointed in their place.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We can cross a river of that kind when we come to it.

Mr. WARREN. That is why I wanted this question considered and decided on an entirely different basis than that regarding the Commerce Court proper.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the view of the Senator from Iowa is that if these lines in the House bill should be omitted altogether the effect would be the same as though they were retained, so far as reducing the number of circuit judges is concerned?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. If the House provision in this respect is retained, when a vacancy occurs, either by death or resignation, we have a law that prohibits the President from appointing any person to fill that vacancy. If, on the other hand, the language of the House is not retained, upon the happening of that event it would be for Congress to determine whether the judicial force of the United States ought to be enlarged.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would it not be the duty of the President to make the appointment without any action of Congress? If the vacancy occurs, he would make the appointment, and it would be sent to the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose I read the law, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. This law was enacted since the Commerce Court was created, and of course will take precedence. The provisions with reference to the circuit courts are definite. The judges are not appointed at large; the appointment must be to some circuit. None of the judges of the Commerce Court are accredited to any circuit. Since the enactment of the Commerce Court law we have enacted this law:

SEC. 116. There shall be nine judicial circuits of the United States, constituted as follows—

Then they are described.

SEC. 117. There shall be in each circuit a circuit court of appeals, which shall consist of three judges, of whom two shall constitute a quorum, and which shall be a court of record, with appellate jurisdiction, as hereinafter limited and established.

Section 18 provides:

There shall be in the second, seventh, and eighth circuits, respectively, four circuit judges; in the fourth circuit, two circuit judges; and in each of the other circuits three circuit judges, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

That is all the circuit judges there can be under existing law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand the law quite that way, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have read it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean I do not give it the interpretation the Senator from Idaho does. We have 34 circuit judges actually in existence. If you will multiply 9 by 3 you have 27, and then if you will add the circuits that are entitled to 4 you will have 29, and you will still have 5 circuit judges unaccounted for, and they are the circuit judges who are now holding the Commerce Court.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will not the Senator from Idaho speak a little louder; we can not hear him, and we are very much interested in our local circuits.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I will.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, what would happen under the statement made by the Senator from Idaho—and his statement is absolutely correct—if a circuit judge in any circuit should die or resign? That circuit is entitled to three judges or four, as the case may be.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are fixed definitely.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are two or three circuits that have four judges.

Mr. LODGE. Three circuits have four judges.

Mr. CUMMINS. Thereupon one of the circuit judges now holding the Commerce Court could be assigned to that circuit, and it would still have the three judges that the law requires, or the four judges, as the case may be.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not. Now, let us see. If the Senator will pardon me, I think we can straighten out this matter from a law subsequent to the act creating the Commerce Court.

This is a provision in the judiciary act—existing law:

There shall be a court of the United States, to be known as the Commerce Court, which shall be a court of record, and shall have a seal of such form and style as the court may prescribe. The said court shall be composed of five judges—

That is the Commerce Court. That is not a circuit court. We changed this somewhat in revising the judiciary act, so that it is not safe to take the act creating the Commerce Court as printed there.

Now let me read further:

The said court shall be composed of five judges, to be from time to time designated and assigned thereto by the Chief Justice of the United States, from among the circuit judges of the United States, for the period of five years—

That does not necessarily involve enlarging the number of circuit judges, because under that provision the circuit judges already designated, to whom I have called attention, would be drawn upon to constitute the court.

But then there is this provision:

Except that in the first instance the court shall be composed of the five additional circuit judges referred to in the next succeeding section, who shall be designated by the President to serve for one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively—

That is a different class of judges. They are not circuit judges. They are not assigned as is provided in the main act. Under the general judiciary act the assignments are made by the Chief Justice, and under this provision they are made by the President.

Now, let us read a little farther. Probably we have been in error in taking the original act as the law of to-day:

In order that the period of designation of one of the said judges shall expire in each year thereafter.

Those are not United States circuit judges. They are judges appointed by the President of the United States in the first instance to inaugurate or install this court. Now, let us see what their status is.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator this question. Were they not appointed by the President as United States circuit judges, and were they not confirmed by the Senate as United States circuit judges?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not the first five.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Were they created as anything except United States circuit judges by the act under which they are holding their offices?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are holding their offices under the act I am reading, but it does not designate them as United States circuit judges. It provides for two classes of judges to hold the Commerce Court. That is, the first class, the members of which are designated, not as United States circuit judges, but as judges of this court. It is just possible that when their terms expire——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that by this act, in express terms, they are appointed circuit judges, and not judges of this court:

The President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five additional circuit judges, etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am reading from a subsequent act.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am reading from the act of June 18, 1910, under which these very judges were appointed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am reading from the judiciary act of 1911.

Mr. PAYNTER. With the Senator's permission, I will invite his attention to the fact that when this matter was under discussion arguments were made against the constitutionality of the proposed act creating the court, because the judges of another court were authorized to preside over this court. I think in that discussion every argument that was made against the constitutionality of the court was based upon that consideration. If you should repeal the act creating the court, would not the effect of it be simply this, that certain duties which are now performed by circuit judges would be no longer required to be performed by them?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true.

Mr. PAYNTER. You would simply diminish the duties that the circuit judges perform.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true.

The judges appointed to preside over the Commerce Court under the act of 1911 are still in office. We have not yet reached the period in our history where it becomes necessary to take into consideration the other provision, because these were temporary appointments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Idaho take the position that we can abolish these places and stop paying the salaries and get rid of these judges altogether?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then let us do it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will see if I can make that plain enough to be acceptable.

When this court was created the law first provided for a temporary administration by the appointment of five additional judges. Those are the judges that are now holding the court. They are not assigned to any circuit. They are not circuit judges of the first or the seventh or the ninth or any other circuit. Their tenure of office is existent. When their term of office expires—that is, the five-year term expressed in the bill—we shall have to draw on the general body of circuit judges. We have not yet reached that point.

Now let us proceed a little further:

Who shall be designated by the President to serve for one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, in order that the period of designation of one of the said judges shall expire in each year thereafter. In case of the death, resignation, or termination of assignment of any judge so designated the Chief Justice shall designate a circuit judge to fill the vacancy so caused.

That contingency never has arisen.

And to serve during the unexpired period for which the original designation was made.

That contemplates the end of a term of service by these judges appointed to be assigned by the President. They do not come under the class of judges that are to be designated or assigned by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. They are a class to themselves; and it is not until there is a vacancy in that class that we will begin to put into operation the provision of law for assigning circuit judges to this court.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to submit this suggestion to the Senator: Suppose this court had continued to exist for 5 years or 10 years, as the case might be, and the act creating it were repealed, what would be the effect of it? Would it operate to deprive these judges of their official positions as circuit judges?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is provided for on the face of the bill.

Mr. PAYNTER. Suppose the terms of the first five judges had expired and five other judges were presiding over the court, what judges would be eliminated as the circuit judges?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is provided for in this act in express terms. The act says that upon the expiration of the terms of these provisional judges, if I may term them such, then for the first time the circuit judges shall enter upon the performance of this duty.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator has at all answered the question I suggested. Suppose the "additional judges" created by that act were no longer serving as judges of this court and had been sent out to various circuits in the country, what would be the effect if we should abolish the court? Would it deprive of their offices as circuit judges the judges who happened to be presiding over this court at the time the act was repealed?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; not their offices of circuit judges, because there is no provision here for circuit judges, except judges of the circuits.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand the position of the Senator from Idaho to be that these judges are not circuit judges in the ordinary sense, and that the law does not now provide for their assignment.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they are additional circuit judges.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And by the abolishment of the court we can at the same time cut off their salaries.

I was going to suggest this amendment. On page 147, after line 10, I propose to insert:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be applied to pay any salaries to any of the circuit judges now serving as judges of the Commerce Court after the 1st day of July, 1912.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, let us take the original language in regard to this matter. Let us take the last paragraph on page 1 of public act 218, and we will see that the language there is not inconsistent with what I have read:

The Commerce Court shall be a court of record, and shall have a seal of such form and style as the court may prescribe.

Now, I am reading the original act.

The said court shall be composed of five judges, to be from time to time designated and assigned—

It does not say "of five circuit judges," but—shall be composed of five judges.

And they are termed not "circuit judges," but "additional judges," in this law.

To be from time to time designated and assigned thereto by the Chief Justice of the United States from among the circuit judges of the United States.

That is the assignment that is made by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. There are two classes of judges. Those of one class are assigned by the Chief Justice and those of the other class are assigned by the President.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator, in connection with this matter, that I have a letter, dated the 4th of this month, from the Attorney General concerning the assignment of these judges to their work in different circuits. When the Senator has concluded, I will ask to have the letter read.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear the Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri rises to a point of order, that there is so much confusion in the Senate that it is impossible to hear what Senators are saying. It seems to the Chair that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Senate is in order——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will assume that it is.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will proceed to say to the Senator from Wyoming that I have no objection at all to his interjecting the letter of the Attorney General. It may possibly throw some light upon the question under discussion.

Mr. WARREN. It gives the idea of the Attorney General as to their employment. It may either come in now or when the Senator has finished.

Mr. HEYBURN. It had better come in now.

Mr. WARREN. Very well; I will send it to the desk now and ask to have it read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 4, 1912.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In connection with any discussion which may arise over the provisions in the legislative bill restoring the appropriations for the Commerce Court, may I draw your attention to one feature of the law relating to that court which in experience has been found to be of great public benefit. I refer to that provision which authorizes the temporary assignment of the judges of that court to hold court in any part of the United States from time to time, as designated by the chief justice, when, in the opinion of the presiding judge of the court, their services are not needed in the court itself. This, in effect, creates a body of five circuit judges at large, who may be sent to places where there is a congestion of business or a shortage of judges; and but for the existence of this provision during the last year there would have been a much greater congestion of public business even than there is in many parts of the United States. For instance, Judge Carland was assigned to and sat in the circuit court of appeals in the eighth circuit during January of this year and came back with 20 cases in which he had been deputed to write the opinions of the court; and I have now a request from the senior circuit judge of that circuit asking that he be assigned to sit in the circuit court of appeals at the Denver term in September. Judge Hunt sat in the circuit and district courts in Montana from the middle of December until the end of January. He was then assigned to sit in the district court of Arizona during the month of April, and on May 1 he went to San Francisco to sit in the circuit court of appeals, to which he was assigned for May and June and where he is now sitting. Judge Mack sat in Chicago in all the Federal courts during the month of January and also during the month of March. On May 1 he went to Arizona, and has sat in the district court there during the entire month of May. Presiding Judge Knapp has, as you doubtless know, been engaged for some weeks past in negotiations under the Erdman Act with Commissioner of Labor Neill in the negotiations for the settlement of one of the most serious labor troubles which has been impending over this country for a long time.

This feature of the usefulness of this body of judges has not been brought very sharply to the attention of the public. I venture to say that no body of five judges in the country has rendered more useful services in more various lines than this body has done since its appointment.

I am, faithfully, yours, GEO. W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is simply an argument in favor of having a roving board of judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to throw some light on this question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The nominations of these judges were sent in by the President and were confirmed by the Senate. I read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate Martin A. Knapp, now serving as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to be additional circuit judge of the United States for the second judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stats., 540), and hereby designated to serve for five years in the Commerce Court.

WM. H. TAFT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 12, 1910.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate Robert W. Archbald, of Pennsylvania, now serving as United States district judge, middle district of Pennsylvania, to be additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stats., 540), and hereby designated to serve for four years in the Commerce Court.

WM. H. TAFT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 12, 1910.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate William H. Hunt, of Montana, now serving as associate judge of the Court of Customs Appeals, to be additional circuit judge of the United States for the ninth judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stats., 540), and hereby designated to serve for three years in the Commerce Court.

WM. H. TAFT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 12, 1910.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate John Emmet Carland, of South Dakota, now serving as United States district judge, district of South Dakota, to be additional circuit judge of the United States for the eighth judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stat., 540), and hereby designated to serve for two years in the Commerce Court.

WM. H. TAFT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 12, 1910.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate Julian W. Mack, of Illinois, to be additional circuit judge of the United States for the seventh judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stat., 540), and hereby designated to serve for one year in the Commerce Court.

WM. H. TAFT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 12, 1910.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, there was no law authorizing the appointment of additional judges to these circuits at the time the appointments were made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was no statute?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. There was no statute authorizing the appointment. I have it before me.

Mr. BACON, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I wish to make a statement and not to occupy the floor.

While there was in the law which authorized them to be appointed no provision that they should be appointed as judges of any particular circuit, there was a provision in the law which required that no two of them should be appointed from the same circuit, and for that reason the particular circuits from which they came were specified.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was merely for the purpose of complying with that prohibition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The provision of the law was as follows:

The President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five additional circuit judges, no two of whom shall be from the same judicial circuit, who shall hold office during good behavior and who shall be from time to time designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States for service in the circuit court of any district, or the circuit court of appeals for any circuit, or in the Commerce Court.

As I recall the appointment of these judges they were designated as being "from" certain judicial circuits but not "of."

Mr. HEYBURN. And not "to."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not "to" or "of."

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the idea. As suggested by the Senator from Georgia, it was merely to comply with the prohibition that no two should be from the same circuit. It has nothing to do with the question whether or not they are circuit judges of that circuit. We did not confirm them as circuit judges from the second, the third, or the seventh district. We confirmed them as additional roving circuit judges designated to serve in this court, if it was a court, but making no provision for their service as circuit judges in any circuit of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were to be from time to time assigned by the Chief Justice to serve in any circuit court—now in any district court—or in any circuit court of appeals.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true, but that does not meet the question. They were not circuit judges of that circuit. They were a roving body of judges termed, in the act creating the court, five additional judges. There is a grave question whether or not we can create a number of circuit judges outside of those necessary and proper to sit in the circuits. In other words, if we can create a roving body of 5, why could we not create 20? The principle is the same.

Now, we are about to abolish this court, and there is no longer any court to which these judges are attached by law. If they are attached hereafter it must be by assignment by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He is not authorized to assign anyone to a circuit except the circuit judges, who are appointed as such and accredited to the circuits named in the appointment. No one of these men came to the Senate for confirmation as circuit judges of any circuit. They came here for confirmation as judges of the Commerce Court.

Now, we had to deal with this with a great deal of care, and it had a great deal of thought and consideration in reforming the judiciary laws which are now in the form of the code. So if anyone can find a place where these judges belong, I would be glad to be enlightened upon that subject. With this court abolished they do not belong in any one of the nine circuits. They may be assigned, or might have been assigned—as under the old law a district judge was assigned—to sit in the court of appeals, which was continually done, but that law no longer exists. When this code was adopted all that old system passed away.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Idaho. When there was before the Senate the bill which organized this court, I was very strongly of the opinion that the law would be unconstitutional if enacted, and I still am of that opinion, so far as the constitution of the court is concerned. In other words, I took the position that the circuit judges existing at the time had been appointed to the execution of the duties of circuit judges and that one could not be deprived of his office for the term of five years and assigned to duty in another court, pending which time he was prohibited from exercising the duties of circuit judge in the court to which he had been originally appointed. I still think that is an unconstitutional law.

The question I want to propound to the Senator is this: If the organic law by which this court was created, and in the constitution of which necessarily the appointment of the judges was a constituent and essential part, was itself unconstitutional, would or would not that carry with it the invalidity of the appointment of any judge under it?

Mr. HEYBURN. That would apply only after the expiration of the provisional court, and if we repeal the law we get rid of it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not catch my exact point.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I think I do.

Mr. BACON. I am very anxious to agree with the Senator, because I would be very glad to get rid of these judges. I was very sorry to see them authorized in the first instance.

The only doubt in my mind is whether, if they were legitimately appointed as circuit judges in the first instance, the abolition of this court will carry the judges with it.

There is no doubt about the fact—we all recognize it—that if they were appointed judges of the Commerce Court, the abolition of the court would abolish the judges as well as the court. But the question in my mind is this: If the law creating the court is unconstitutional—I think it is; I have never had a doubt in my mind on that question—would or would not that provision of the law which made provision for the appointment of the judges be with the balance of it an unconstitutional enactment?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think it would affect the constitutionality of the act creating the court merely because Congress made an unconstitutional provision with reference to who should preside over the court. I do not think it would go that far.

Mr. BACON. I was in hopes it would.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am giving my conscientious judgment.

Mr. BACON. Of course I want to agree with the Senator, if I can.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do not hesitate.

Mr. PAYNTER. If they are not circuit judges why are they called additional circuit judges?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are additional circuit judges for the purpose expressed in the very act where the term is used.

Mr. PAYNTER. If the purpose was not to increase the number of circuit judges and to make them circuit judges as much as any other circuit judges, why were they not designated as judges of the Court of Commerce?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no such thing as a circuit judge, except he is a circuit judge of some court designated by law.

Mr. PAYNTER. Under the law these judges can perform other duties than those of judges of the Court of Commerce.

Mr. HEYBURN. By assignment.

Mr. PAYNTER. By assignment, the same as the other judges. Do they lose the power to perform these other duties because they are relieved of the necessity of presiding over the Court of Commerce?

Mr. HEYBURN. We create courts under the Constitution. That is the only thing we are authorized to do in that connection. The court is the basis of all subsequent action, and we are authorized to create courts inferior to the Supreme Court.

Now, in the creating of a court we are of course necessarily authorized to provide for the judges of that court, but we are nowhere authorized in the Constitution or elsewhere to create judges except to preside over an established and designated court. If we could, we might have a reserve corps of judges on hand to be sent out here and there upon assignment.

Mr. PAYNTER. I agree with the Senator on that question substantially as he has stated it. But when this court was created the law created additional duties to be performed by circuit judges, and they were directed to preside over this Court of Commerce, and they are as much judges of a circuit as any other judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Idaho a question? I should like to have his opinion. Suppose we make provision that the judges created by that act are hereby abolished. Does the Senator think we could abolish them?

Mr. HEYBURN. That question would arise if we were to attempt to abolish the circuit courts.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can we not abolish the circuit courts?

Mr. HEYBURN. We have abolished the circuit courts.

Mr. OVERMAN. Could not we destroy every circuit court in this country and every court below the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. HEYBURN. We have abolished circuit courts by that act, but we have created a new court in which the circuit judges shall perform their functions—that is, the circuit court of appeals. The circuit court of appeals takes the place of the circuit courts so far as providing duties for the circuit judges.

I have some doubt in my mind as to whether or not, having created courts, we are at liberty to abolish them. I have grave doubts as to our power to abolish all of the courts except the United States Supreme Court. The Constitution gives us power to create courts, but does not give us power to abolish them. It says in express terms that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the very language "from time to time" settle the question that Congress could not only create but abolish circuit judgeships; and did not the Congress of 1801 to 1803 abolish a good many of them?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not urging this as a final conclusion. It is a question in my mind that is open, and has been for years, as to how far Congress could go in abolishing courts that it had established pursuant to the constitutional power and mandate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My recollection may be at fault, but it is to the effect that the Congress which was serving in the last year of John Adams's administration created a lot of Federal judgeships for the purpose of perpetuating them upon the bench, or whatever the purpose may have been; it created them at any rate, and the Congress which came in with Mr. Jefferson abolished every one of them.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is rather an interesting piece of historic controversy, and it is a pretty large subject. Chief Justice Marshall came in on the last day of the old Federal administration, and it was a very great controversy at that time. But it did not deal with or settle the question as to whether or not it is within the power of Congress, having created a judiciary system, to destroy it and strip it down to the Supreme Court of the United States and rest in that tribunal the duties of the administration of the law so far as the courts do administer it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I take it for granted that if there had been any standing in court for the abolished judges to whom I referred they would have found it out; they would have asserted their rights.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will refer back to the history of that time, I think he will find that they did not abolish the courts, but abolished the officers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They simply repealed the act which created the courts. That is my recollection.

Mr. HEYBURN. They did not repeal the act that created the district court.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not the act that created all the district courts, but they simply repealed that act, and that abolished these several judgeships.

Mr. HEYBURN. That only went to the question of a number of courts. It did not go to the question of the right to create a court, but it went to the question of the number of courts that might be created; and Congress did assume to repeal the law providing for the additional courts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all this question is. This is a question as to whether or not the circuit judgeships shall continue to exist, to wit, the three circuit judgeships filled by the men who have presided over the Court of Commerce.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the makers of the Constitution had only in mind courts of general jurisdiction. I do not think that courts of limited jurisdiction were included within the contemplation of the makers of the Constitution because in one sense, in the fullest sense of the word, they are not courts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I read a few moments ago a suggested amendment to be placed after line 10 on page 147, which provided that hereafter no money should be paid to either of the judges who now sit on the Commerce Court. Following that I suggest this language:

And so much of the act of Congress approved on the 18th day of June, 1910, as authorized the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint five additional circuit judges is hereby repealed, and the five additional circuit judgeships thereby established are hereby abolished.

Mr. HEYBURN. I make this suggestion to the Senator: That act having been complied with, it seems to me that the amendment would not be effective of any purpose. The President's power has been exhausted, he has already appointed those judges, and the repeal of the act would not affect the status of the judges.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it the view of the Senator from Idaho that the offices are already abolished?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the President has fully exhausted the function of the power that was given him under the act. So we could accomplish nothing by repealing it, so far as his right to act is concerned. He had the right to act but once. He did not have the right to act more than once, and, having acted, his functions are exhausted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to make a request. With the kindness of the Senator from Idaho, who yields to me, I make the following request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho yields to the Senator from Massachusetts, who asks for the entry of a unanimous-consent agreement, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is hereby agreed by unanimous consent that from and including Monday, June 17, to and including Saturday, June 29, no business other than the routine morning business of the Senate shall be transacted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. I object at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. LODGE. I ask permission to say only one word. There will be some 30 Senators absent from the Senate next week, and the following week there will probably be as many. It is idle to suppose that we can do business under those circumstances. We might as well face the facts, and arrange it so that Senators may know that they are not to be obliged to stay here to answer to calls for a quorum which can not be produced.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the matter is going over I know, but I suggest to the Senator to add to the agreement a clause providing that the Senate in each of these two succeeding weeks will meet on Monday and adjourn to Thursday and adjourn from Thursday to the succeeding Monday.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to add that. I have no objection at all to it.

Mr. BACON. I do not offer that with a view to present action, but as the matter is going over I merely suggest it to be considered.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; that is all right.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The unanimous-consent agreement asked for by the Senator from Massachusetts was simply a method of meeting a condition that confronts us.

Mr. LODGE. That is all.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If anyone can suggest a better one, I am sure it will be equally agreeable to everybody. There will certainly be no quorum here, and the presumption was that with this unanimous-consent agreement no business should be transacted and the Senate would every three days adjourn. We can not adjourn more than three days, for a longer time would require the consent of the other House, which can not be obtained.

Mr. LODGE. That will take care of itself.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This is simply presented as a method of taking care of the situation. If any Senator can suggest any other method which will do it more easily, it would be very agreeable.

Mr. LODGE. No business will be done during those two weeks, and we might as well make it as easy as we can for everybody by having it understood.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Only we could make it still easier. If there is not going to be a sufficient number here to transact business, I do not see why any of us should stay.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely the idea. There will be nothing done in the nature of business, and the Senate will adjourn from three days to three days and let everybody go who wishes to leave.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator why he made it to cover two weeks?

Mr. LODGE. The Republican national convention meets on Tuesday, the 18th. The Democratic national convention meets on Tuesday, the 25th. I want to cover both conventions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What were the dates given?

Mr. LODGE. It begins on the 17th, next Monday, and ends on the 29th of June, Saturday, which really carries it over to Monday, the 1st of July, as the first day to begin business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator if, under the agreement, such morning business as calling the calendar under Rule VIII would be in order?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; nothing but the introduction of bills, or the report of bills to go on the calendar, or the presentation of petitions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not desire to protract the consideration of this question, but it is one absolutely necessary to be taken into consideration in passing upon the question whether we shall retain or strike out this provision. It goes right to the tenure of office of these judges. The term of one of the judges has expired, and he has been reassigned to duty.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator something which has just occurred to me, to see what weight it may be entitled to. It is a fundamental proposition—I think the Senator from Idaho himself just cast a doubt upon it, but it is one upon which I have no doubt, and it can be abundantly sustained by authority—that the abolition of an office abolishes also the tenure of office; in other words, deprives the man who held the office of his commission.

The circuit courts of the United States are courts created by legislative act. They are not courts created by the Constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are created under the authority of the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. That is true. I do not propose to raise that question now. I have no doubt in the world of our power to abolish the entire circuit court in all its branches, including the circuit court of appeals. I am equally confident in the opinion that when we did so every officer of those courts would go with it.

Assuming that to be so, what is the consequence? These circuit courts of the United States are not created by a general law creating all the circuits as one system, but they are created by special acts, each circuit being created separately. In a large measure they are created at different times; they are not all created at the same time. In each instance before the act we now have under consideration was passed, whenever a circuit judge was nominated and confirmed he was nominated and confirmed not as a judge of the circuit court, but as the judge of a particular circuit court. That being so, if Congress had seen fit to abolish any one of those circuits, if my premise is correct, it would have carried with it the circuit judge who had been appointed as the judge of that court.

If that proposition is correct, then I come to the next proposition. We have here enacted a law which provides for the creation of a different kind of circuit court jurisdiction, a roving commission.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it is not circuit court jurisdiction; it is circuit judge jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of the fact that they are not appointed to any particular circuit, but they are appointed, as it were, at large. I will put it that way. They are appointed as judges at large.

Now, if we should repeal the act which authorized the appointment of circuit court judges at large, why would not that carry with it the office of the judges who were appointed practically at large, and only at large?

Mr. HEYBURN. That would not be pursuant to the authority given by the Constitution. There is not a word in the Constitution that provides for the appointment of circuit judges.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon the interruption, he does not catch the conclusion to which I endeavored to bring that process of reasoning.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I do.

Mr. BACON. It is this, that if we have the power by the abolition of the ninth circuit, for instance, to carry with it the judges who were appointed as the judges of the ninth circuit, why have we not the power in the repeal of a law which provides for judges at large also at the same time to abolish the judges?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me say, before the Senator concludes, that I did not understand him; that I now not only understand him, but I am in accord with his conclusion.

Mr. BACON. It is a sound proposition.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia. The Senator from Georgia refers to these as roving circuit judges.

Mr. BACON. I corrected that.

Mr. PAYNTER. The Senator will recall that when the President sent these nominations to the Senate he and other members of the Judiciary Committee criticized the language of the appointment and the language used by the President as it appears in the Journal, as read by the Senator from North Carolina, designating the districts in which they should serve.

Mr. BACON. No; not in which they should serve.

Mr. PAYNTER. Therefore, I hardly think it is logical, under those circumstances to repeal a law creating roving circuit judges and then take for the circuit judges judges who are designated for districts.

Mr. BACON. The Senator forgets the fact that upon the objection of the Senator from Idaho I withdrew the word "roving" and spoke of them as having been appointed at large. I think that is true, because the appointment, as suggested by the Senator from Utah, is not to a particular circuit, but the word "from" is used, and the reason for it is that previously stated by me, that the law provided that no two of them should be from any one district. Therefore the nominating officer, the President of the United States, in order to show that he was complying with the law, designated the particular district from which each one was selected—not appointed but selected—with a view of showing that he had complied with the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. And he might have said from the State of Mississippi or the State of Michigan.

Mr. BACON. Yes; and instead of using the word "roving" I would say that they were appointed at large, the only restriction being as to some geographical consideration. But if appointed at large they are certainly a distinct body of judges from the others; and if we can repeal the law which creates a circuit we could certainly repeal the law which provided for the appointment of judges at large. If we repeal the law properly which provides for appointing those at large, then it is, I will not say a conclusive result, that the judges go with it, but there is certainly pretty strong argument on that side of the line.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks the term "additional circuit judge" is equivalent to "circuit judge at large"?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is evident that we can not properly conclude the consideration of this question at this time, and it is desired that we now lay aside the measure for reasons which will be obvious to the Senate. I ask the chairman to lay aside this bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this measure is one which I hoped to finish to-night, and I would not be willing to yield until we finish it, except that there is a matter of the highest privilege to be brought before the Senate, which is the announcement to be made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. I give notice that I shall move to take up the bill early to-morrow.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE WICKLIFFE, OF LOUISIANA.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of the Hon. ROBERT C. WICKLIFFE, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions (H. Res. 579), as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 11, 1912.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ROBERT C. WICKLIFFE, a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expense in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions (S. Res. 339), which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

The resolutions were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ROBERT C. WICKLIFFE, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed under the second resolution as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. FOSTER, Mr. THORNTON, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. PERCY, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. PAYNTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 12, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 11, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O, Thou, who art the architect and builder of the universe, the life and light of men, the inspiration of every permanent movement toward the betterment of the conditions in the social, political, and religious life of Thy children, continue, we beseech Thee, Thy favors unto us as individuals and as a people, that we may continue the onward march toward the higher civilization, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONVEYING LOT IN ALVA, OKLA.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16612) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain lot in the city of Alva, State of Oklahoma, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF TYPHOID FEVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, House concurrent resolution 43, providing for the printing and distribution of Public Health Bulletin No. 51, being a report on the cause and prevention of typhoid fever, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, is this a concurrent resolution?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Should it not be a joint resolution?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. EDWARDS. How are these to be distributed?

Mr. FINLEY. Through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 23626. An act to appropriate $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to equip all Army transports with all lifeboats and rafts necessary to accommodate every person for which transportation facilities are now provided on said transports and the crew of said transports.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DUPRÉ, for 15 days, on account of important business.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 18956) and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the conference report on the Army appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make points of order against the statement, if it be in order, as well as against the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, no point of order would lie against the statement. It will be necessary to read the report.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to waiving the reading of the report and having the statement read, providing that my rights are preserved against the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's rights will be preserved.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask, then, that the conference report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 762).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18956) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 21, 22, 29, 30, 32, 38, 41, 58, 61, 63, 64, 65, 75, and 76.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 14, 18, 19, 20, 24, 25, 26, 34, 36, 39, 44, 47, 49, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 60, and 70, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert the following: " : Provided, That hereafter in time of peace whenever any officer holding a permanent commission with rank below that of lieutenant colonel shall not have been actually present for at least two of the last preceding six years in that branch of the Army in which he shall hold said commission and with the organization, if any, to which he shall have been assigned by competent authority, such officer shall not be detached nor permitted to remain detached from said branch or from said organization; and all pay and allowances shall be forfeited by any superior officer for any period during which, by his order, or with his permission, or by reason of his failure or neglect to issue or cause to be issued the proper order or instructions at the proper time, any other officer shall be detached or permitted to remain detached in violation of any of the terms of this proviso: Provided further, That nothing in the foregoing proviso shall be held to apply in the case of any officer for such period as shall be actually necessary for him, after having been relieved from detached service, to join that branch in which he shall hold a permanent commission and the organization, if any, to which he shall be assigned by competent authority, nor shall it be held to apply in the case of any officer absent temporarily on courts-martial or military boards, or upon leaves of absence authorized by existing law: And provided further, That hereafter details to the Ordnance Department may continue to be made as authorized by existing law, and, in the discretion of the President, those details, or any of them, now existing to the Philippine Constabulary need not be terminated until the 1st day of January, 1913"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment, after the word "enlist," insert the following: ": And provided further, That nothing in this provision shall be so construed as to forfeit credit for double time already accrued"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 7 of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment strike out the word "an" and insert in lieu thereof the word "any," and in line 8, beginning with the word "who," strike out all down to and including the comma after the word "thereto," in line 10; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert the following:

"Equipment of Coast Artillery, armories, Organized Militia: There is hereby made available, and the same shall remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1913, the unexpended balances of any appropriations heretofore made for dummy guns and mortars; mounts for dummy guns and mortars; dummy ammunition; loading appliances; range and position finding equipment; aiming and laying devices; subcaliber tubes and mountings therefor; labor and material necessary to install dummy guns and mortars; and to provide appliances and devices for instructional purposes in armory buildings provided by States for Coast Artillery companies of the Organized Militia."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert: " : Provided further, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell and convey to the State of Texas, on or before July 1, 1913, for the purposes of a State tuberculosis sanitarium, the military reservation of Fort Clark, Tex., or such portion of it as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be sold, at a price to be fixed by a board of three appraisers, one of whom shall be designated by the Secretary of War, one by the governor of Texas, and the third to be agreed upon by the two appraisers first designated, $1,700,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 42: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert the following:

"Provided, That a commission to consist of Lieut. Gens. Samuel B. M. Young and Arthur MacArthur, retired, and Maj. Gens. George M. Randall, Jesse M. Lee, and Charles F. Humphrey, retired, and two members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, who shall be designated by the President of the Senate, and two members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, who shall be designated by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is hereby created to consider and report to the Senate and House of Representatives on or before the 1st day of January, 1913, upon the location and distribution of military posts which are required within the continental limits of the United States for the proper accommodation, instruction, and training of the Army, but not including Coast Artillery posts and troops. The commission shall make recommendations, giving reasons in detail therefor, as to which of the existing posts shall be retained or abandoned, and of those recommended to be retained which, if any, shall be enlarged, and to what extent. In all of its recommendations the commission shall have due regard for the proper distribution of the different arms of the service as determined by strategic, sanitary, and economical considerations, and by the relations which should be maintained by the Regular Army with the Organized Militia and the public at large, and taking into consideration the number of troops which may be stationed in Hawaii and the Canal Zone. The commission shall meet upon the call of the chairman, who shall be the senior lieutenant general on the commission, at the earliest practicable date, and proceed to the execution of the work of the commission in such manner as the commission may determine. Prior to the rendition of the report hereinbefore required it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to authorize the commencement of no new posts within the continental limits of the United States and to preserve and maintain in the same manner as at the time of the passage of this act all posts now in existence which are liable to enlargement or retention, according to the terms of this act. Actual and necessary expenses of the commission shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively and equally."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert the following: ": Provided, That not exceeding $1,000 of the sum herein appropriated, together with the unexpended balance, which is hereby reappropriated, of the appropriation in the Army appropriation act approved March 3, 1911, for the improvement of the Crow Creek or Fort D. A. Russell target and maneuver reservation, Wyoming, may be expended by the Secretary of War, in his discretion, in the acquirement by purchase or condemnation proceedings of certain tracts of land required for the maneuvering of troops and other military purposes lying within the limits of the aforesaid reservation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 62: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed in said amendment insert "one hundred and fifty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 69: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"SEC. 2. That hereafter all enlistments in the Army shall be made for the term of four years, and for all enlistments hereafter accomplished four years shall be counted as an enlistment period in computing continuous-service pay."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Change the numerical designation of section 4 so as to read "Sec. 3," and restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by this amendment with amendments as follows: After the word "rank," in line 30 of the amendment, strike out the period and the word "so" and insert ": Provided, That when a permanent officer is promoted he shall take the relative rank of the officers in the grade to which he is promoted which he held as indicated in the relative rank of the Army on the Army Register of 1912: Provided further, That so"; and after the word "occurred," in line 37, strike out the period and the word "the" and insert ": Provided further, That on and after the 1st day of January, 1917, any vacancies occurring among officers of the Quartermaster Corps with rank above that of colonel may, in the discretion of the President, be filled by selection from among officers who shall have served by detail in said corps for not less than four years: Provided further, That the"; and after the word "Provided," in line 44, strike out the comma and the word "That" and insert "further, That no details to fill vacancies in the grade of colonel in the Quartermaster Corps shall be made until the number of officers of that grade shall have been reduced by 3, and thereafter the number of officers in that grade shall not exceed 12; and no details to fill vacancies in the grade of lieutenant colonel in the Quartermaster Corps shall be made until the number of officers of that grade shall have been reduced by 3, and thereafter the number of officers in that grade shall not exceed 18; and"; in line 48, strike out the word "forty-six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty-eight"; in line 52, after the words "one hundred," insert "and two"; in line 68, after the word "perform," insert ", but such regimental, battalion, and squadron quartermasters and commissaries shall not be required to receipt for any money or property which does not pertain to their respective regiments, battalions, or squadrons, and they shall not be separated from the organization to which they belong"; in line 75, after the words "major general," insert "during the service as such of the first incumbent of the office, and thereafter the rank of brigadier general"; in line 81, after the word "first," strike out the word "vacancy" and insert "two vacancies"; in line 84, after the word "occur," strike out the words "that vacancy" and insert "those vacancies"; in line 85, after the word "the," strike out the words "vacancy occurs" and insert "vacancies occur"; and at the end of the amendment, after the word "law," in line 90, insert ": Provided further, That for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this section the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the major general herein provided for immediately upon the passage of this act, and it shall be the duty of the said major general, under direction of the President and the Secretary of War, to put into effect the provisions of this section not less than 60 days after the passage of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 73: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That hereafter, except in time of war or when war is imminent, no officer who shall have served four years as Chief of Staff shall be eligible for further service as Chief of Staff until after he shall have served for at least two years with the line of the Army; neither shall any officer, after the 5th day of March, 1913, be detailed, nor be permitted to serve, as Chief of Staff unless he shall have served at least 10 years as a commissioned officer of the line of the Army in grades below that of brigadier general, and the General Staff Corps shall hereafter consist of 2 general officers, one of whom shall be Chief of Staff, 3 colonels, 4 lieutenant colonels, 8 majors, and 10 captains or first lieutenants, all of whom shall be detailed from the Army at large in the manner and for the periods provided by law, and hereafter details to the General Staff Corps, excepting the two general officers, shall be subject to the provisions of section 27 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, entitled 'An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States.' All officers of the line of the Army now detailed for service in any staff corps, or department, or in the General Staff Corps, shall be relieved from duty in said corps at the expiration of their present periods of detail, or sooner if the President shall so direct, and all officers hereafter detailed for service in the staff corps, departments, and General Staff Corps shall be relieved therefrom at the expiration of four years of such service, or sooner if the President shall so direct, and no officer who shall have served for four years under detail in any staff corps, or department, or the General Staff Corps, shall be eligible for further service therein until after he shall have served at least two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in time of war or when war is imminent: Provided, That hereafter when any officer shall, under the provisions of section 26 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, be appointed to an office with rank above that of colonel, his appointment to said office and his acceptance of the appointment shall create a vacancy in the arm, staff corps, or staff department, from which he shall be appointed, and said vacancy shall be filled in the manner prescribed by existing law, but he shall retain in said arm, staff corps, or staff department the same relative position that he would have held if he had not been appointed to said office, and he shall return to said relative position upon the expiration of his appointment to said office, unless he shall be reappointed thereto. If under the operation of this proviso the number of officers of any particular grade in any arm, staff corps, or staff department shall at any time exceed the number authorized by law, no vacancy occurring in said grade shall be filled until after the total number of officers therein shall have been reduced to the number authorized by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"SEC. 6. That hereafter the service of a cadet who may hereafter be appointed to the United States Military Academy or to the Naval Academy shall not be counted in computing for any purpose the length of service of any officer of the Army."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Renumber the two sections at the end of the bill, so as to read "Sec. 7" and "Sec. 8," instead of "Sec. 8" and "Sec. 9."

JAMES HAY,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. A. DU PONT,
F. E. WARREN,
MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. 18956 submit the following statement:

Amendment No. 1 gives the privilege to the Army War College of buying and exchanging typewriters, but does not increase the appropriation, and the House recedes from the amendment.

Amendment No. 2 struck out "air planes" and inserted "aeroplanes," and the House recedes with an amendment inserting "air ships."

Amendment No. 3 reduced the appropriation from $375,000 to $350,000, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 4 increased the amount to be used for the purchase of air ships from $75,000 to $100,000, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 5 is the same as amendment No. 2, and the House recedes with an amendment.

Amendment No. 6 provided for the reduction of tolls of the Alaska Cable and Telegraph messages to 50 per cent of the present rates, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 7 provided for $7,700,000 for pay of officers of the line, being $806,792 more than the House had appropriated for this purpose, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 8 provided $1,767,120 for additional pay of officers for length of service, being $243,000 more than was appriated by the House, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 9 provided that no money appropriated by this act should be paid to any officer for any period during which any other officer by his order shall have been detached from duty of any kind for more than four years of the preceding six years from his organization, etc., and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 10 changed House provision providing for the nonpayment of money to any officer in cases in which he may have been detached for duty for more than four of the preceding six years from the organization in which he is commissioned, and the House recedes with an amendment which is fully set out in the conference report.

Amendment No. 11 provided $16,232,954 for pay of enlisted men, being $400,954 more than was appropriated by the House, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 12 provides for the withholding of pay from officers and enlisted men who are absent as a result of their intemperate use of drugs, alcoholic liquors, or other misconduct, and the House recedes, the House conferees believing that the language of the Senate accomplished the purpose desired better than that of the House.

Amendment 12½ provides for a reserve to be used in time of war. This reserve can be used without any cost to the Government until it is called into active service in the Army during war and will cost the Government nothing except in the event of war.

Amendment 13 provides for $1,635,000 for additional pay for length of service of enlisted men, being $100,000 more than was appropriated by the House, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 14 strikes out the House provision for the abolition of five regiments of Cavalry, and the House recedes.

Amendment 15 provides for $940,000 for pay of the enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, being $90,000 more than the House appropriated, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 16 provided $165,000 for additional pay for length of service to enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, being $5,000 more than the House appropriated, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 17 provides that in the future length of service for retirement for double time for foreign service shall not be given to those who hereafter enlist, and the House recedes with an amendment providing that nothing in this provision shall be construed to diminish the time of any soldier who has already received the benefit of the law as it now is.

Amendment 18 provides that the superintendent of the Nurse Corps shall receive allowance of quarters, subsistence, and medical care, and the House recedes.

Amendment 19 reduces the amount appropriated by the House for contract surgeons from $18,000 to $13,000, and the House recedes.

Amendment 20 provides that the age limit for the retirement of Army paymasters' clerks shall be the same as the age limit for the retirement of commissioned officers of the Army, and the House recedes.

Amendment 21 provided $500,000 for commutation of quarters to commissioned officers and others on duty without troops, being $30,000 more than the House appropriated, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 22 provides for $900,000 for travel allowance for enlisted men on discharge, being $100,000 more than the House appropriated, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 23 provides that hereafter an enlisted man on discharge shall be entitled to transportation in kind and subsistence from the place of his discharge to the place of his enlistment. Or in lieu of such transportation and subsistence he shall receive, if he so elects, 2 cents per mile except for sea travel. And the House recedes with an amendment which puts this provision of law into effect at once. It is computed by the Pay Department that this provision will save $500,000 annually.

Amendments 24 and 25 strike out quotation marks, and the House recedes on both.

Amendment 26 provides $266,000 for additional 10 per cent increase of pay of officers on foreign service, and the House recedes.

Amendment 27 provides for $750,000 additional 10 per cent increase on pay of enlisted men on foreign service, and the House recedes with an amendment providing that hereafter the laws allowing increase of pay to officers and enlisted men for foreign service shall not apply to service in the Canal Zone, Panama, Porto Rico, and Hawaii.

Amendment 28 provides that section 3602, Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of Congress of February 27, 1877, shall not be construed as precluding Army paymasters from drawing checks in favor of persons or institutions designated by indorsement made on his monthly pay account by an officer of the Army who is stationed beyond the continental limits of the United States, or in Alaska, or the Canal Zone, Panama, and the House recedes with an amendment which will include all officers of the Army wherever stationed.

Amendments 29, 30, 31, 32, 63, 64, 65, and 67 insert the words "National Guard or," and the Senate recedes from all of these amendments.

Amendment 31 provides an appropriation for dummy guns and mortars and other appliances, and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the appropriation of $275,000 and providing that the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this last year be reappropriated.

Amendment 33 provides $8,988,867.42 for the purchase of subsistence supplies, etc., being $383,594.42 more than was appropriated by the House, and the House recedes with an amendment reducing this appropriation by $191,787.

Amendment 34 provides that the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 30, 1906, shall not apply to the Subsistence Department, and the House recedes.

Amendment 35 provides for $7,865,688 for regular supplies for the Quartermaster's Department, being $408,915 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the appropriation made by the Senate by the sum of $308,915.

Amendment 36 increases the appropriation for the equipment of officers' schools from $400,000 to $600,000, and the House recedes.

Amendment 37 provides $2,000,000 for incidental expenses Quartermaster's Department, being $263,663 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the amount appropriated by the Senate by the sum of $114,000.

Amendment 38 provides for the appropriation of $500 to be expended for the purchase of not less than five cups to be awarded to horse breeders to encourage breeding of horses suitable for military purposes, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 39 provides for $300,000 for horses for Cavalry, Artillery, etc., being $25,000 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes because this sum is necessary, as the Cavalry is not to be reduced.

Amendments 40, 42, 47, and 48 strike out the House provisions providing that no money shall be spent out of any appropriation on certain Army posts enumerated in such amendments, and the House recedes from all of these amendments, with an amendment to amendment 42 providing for a commission which is required to report to Congress on or before the 1st day of January, 1913. The House conferees were of opinion that it was necessary for Congress to have the information which the commission is directed to obtain in order that Congress might adopt for itself a definite policy with regard to the vexed question of the location and concentration of posts for the mobile Army.

Amendment 40: The House recedes with an amendment providing that $70,000 be deducted from the amount appropriated by the Senate for barracks and quarters.

Amendment 41 provides for the construction of an assembly building at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 43 provides $11,250,000 for the transportation of the Army and its supplies, being $526,472 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the amount appropriated by the Senate by the sum of $400,000.

Amendment 44 provides that $60,000 of the foregoing appropriation for the transportation of the Army shall be immediately available, and the House recedes.

Amendment 46 provides for the expenditure of $700,000 for the purchase of a tract of land adjoining the military reservation of Fort Sam Houston, Tex., and for the expenditure of $22,000 to macadamize the roadway upon the Government property between the United States Government experimental farm and the Arlington National Cemetery, in the county of Alexandria, Va., and for the expenditure of $44,000 for the construction of a public road from the southern end of the new Highway Bridge across the Potomas River to a point near the southern boundary of the Arlington Reservation, and for the purchase of a parcel of land, not to exceed 4 acres, and for the expenditure of $3,600 for completing the macadamizing of the road between the city of Vancouver and the barracks at Vancouver military post, and the House recedes, with an amendment which provides that the $44,000 for the construction of public road and purchase of 4 acres of land shall not be made.

Amendment 49 provides $125,000 for the construction and maintenance of military and post roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska, and the House recedes.

Amendment 50 provides for $600,000 for barracks and quarters in the Philippine Islands, being $150,000 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes, with an amendment cutting down the amount appropriated by the Senate by the sum of $100,000.

Amendment 51 provides for $5,431,700 for clothing and camp and garrison equipage, being $628,429 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes, with an amendment reducing the amount appropriated by the Senate by the sum of $431,700.

Amendments 52, 53, and 54 provide for the payment of certain claims against the Government of the United States, making in all $50,862. These claims are due entirely to damages to and loss of private property occasioned by heavy gunfire and target practice of troops and for damages to private property during maneuvers and other military operations for which the Government is responsible. A part of this amount is due to Indians for the value of improvements made by them upon lands afterwards included in the Fort William H. Seward Military Reservation, and another part of the amount is due to an officer and certain enlisted men of the Army for the money value of clothing worn out by them in the summer of 1910 while fighting forest fires in the Northwest. Amendment 52 also provides for the ascertainment and adjustment of amounts which may become due on all claims for damages to and loss of private property when the amount of claim does not exceed the sum of $1,000, occasioned by heavy gunfire and target practice and other military operations for which the Government is responsible, and the House recedes from all of these amendments.

Amendment 55 is the insertion of a comma, and the House recedes.

Amendment 56 is the insertion of certain words left out by mistake in the item for the equipment and maintenance of the school at Washington Barracks, and the House recedes.

Amendment 57 provides $337,118.30 for ordnance service, and the House recedes, with an amendment reducing the amount by $37,000.

Amendment 58 provides $350,000 for ordnance stores, ammunition, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 59 provides $875,000 for small-arm target practice, being $135,000 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes, with an amendment cutting down the appropriation made by the Senate by the sum of $75,000.

Amendment 60 provides for $700,000 for the manufacture of arms, being $100,000 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes.

Amendment 61 provides for $750,000 for ordnance stores and supplies, being $50,000 more than the House appropriated, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 62 provides for $200,000 for automatic machine rifles, being $100,000 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes with an amendment cutting down the appropriation of the Senate by the sum of $50,000.

Amendment 66 provides for $1,250,000 for Field Artillery for the Organized Militia, being $480,000 more than the House appropriated, and the House recedes with an amendment cutting down the amount appropriated by the Senate by the sum of $250,000.

Amendment 67 provides $500,000 for ammunition for the Organized Militia, and the House recedes with an amendment providing $100,000 for this purpose.

Amendment 68 appropriates $33,000 to reimburse the government of the District of Columbia for the site acquired for a reformatory, the title of which is now in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and giving to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the use of certain clay deposits, and so forth, and the House recedes with an amendment providing that the title to this site be transferred to the Secretary of War for such purposes as may be hereafter specifically authorized by Congress and striking out the two provisos in the Senate amendment. The conferees agreed to this amendment because of the representations made to them by the regents of the Mount Vernon Association.

Amendment 69 struck out the House provision providing for a term of enlistment in the Army of five years, and the House recedes with an amendment providing that hereafter the term of enlistment shall be four years.

Amendment 70 struck out the provision of the House which repealed the laws authorizing increase of pay of commissioned officers and enlisted men for foreign service, and the House recedes.

Amendment 71 struck out the provision of the House providing for a Quartermaster Corps, and the House recedes with sundry amendments, as follows:

Providing that there shall be 1 major general, 1 brigadier general, 12 colonels, 18 lieutenant colonels, 48 majors, and 102 captains in the Quartermaster Corps, and providing further that regimental, battalion, and squadron quartermasters and commissaries shall not be required to account for property when they are ordered away with their commands at posts.

Providing also that the major general provided for in this section shall be appointed at once and shall be given 60 days from the passage of the bill to put into effect the consolidation provided for.

Amendment 72 struck out the provision of the House for a Service Corps, and the House recedes with an amendment on page 66, line 13, by inserting after the word "clerks" the words "civil service" and after the word "employees" the words "and employees." This was done to make it clear that all civil-service employees and employees of the classified service now in the Government should be exempted from the provisions of this act.

Amendment 73 struck out the provision of the House providing for the consolidation of the office establishments of The Adjutant General, Inspector General, and the Chief of Staff of the Army, and the House recedes with an amendment striking out all of section 6 beginning on page 67, line 22, down to and including the words "Provided further," on page 72, line 18, and amended the remainder of the section, as appears in the conference report. These changes provide, in the first place, that all officers of the line detailed for service in any staff corps shall only remain in the said corps four years and shall not be eligible for further service in said corps until they shall have served at least two years in the branch of the Army in which they are commissioned. The chiefs of staff corps may return to the position they would have held in their respective corps after they have served four years unless they shall be reappointed. They also provide that the Chief of Staff of the Army, after four years' service as such, shall not again act as Chief of Staff for two years, and that a Chief of Staff hereafter shall not be permitted to serve as such unless he shall have served 10 years in the line of the Army in grades below that of brigadier general, and that the General Staff Corps shall hereafter consist of 2 general officers, 3 colonels, 4 lieutenant colonels, 8 majors, and 10 captains or first lieutenants.

Amendment 74 strikes out the provision of the House for the reduction of general officers and cadet service in computing for any purpose the length of service of any officer of the Army, and the House recedes with an amendment providing that hereafter service as a cadet of the United States Military Academy or Naval Academy who may be hereafter appointed as such shall not be counted in computing for any purpose the length of service of any officer of the Army.

Amendment 75 cuts out the provision of the House providing that the appropriation provided for the several departments consolidated under this act shall be available for the consolidated corps herein created, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 76 strikes out section 9 of the House bill, which provides that nothing in this act shall be held or construed to separate any officer from the Army or to diminish the rank held by him, and that all laws and parts of laws, so far as they are inconsistent with the terms of this act, are repealed, and the Senate recedes.

The bill as it passed the Senate appropriated	$95,314,710.98
The Senate receded from items amounting to	4,660,148.00
And the bill now carries	90,654,562.98
Amount appropriated for fiscal year 1912	92,587,785.97
Reduction over amount appropriated for fiscal year 1912	1,933,222.99

Legislation is agreed to by the conferees which will result in a very large saving in the future. This legislation embraces a four-year term of enlistment, the consolidation of the supply departments, the Service Corps, the reduction of travel-pay allowances to enlisted men on discharge, the abolition of double time for purposes of retirement, and other minor features; which, it is conservatively estimated, will effect in the future an annual saving for the maintenance of the military establishment of not less than $10,000,000.

JAMES HAY,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I make the following points of order against the conference report:

That the conferees have discussed and proposed amendments which have not been committed to them by either of the Houses and therein have exceeded their jurisdiction, and which amendments, agreed to and reported by the conference committee, are not germane to the amendments of the Senate or to the original bill, specifically calling attention to amendments numbered 40, 42, and 73.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois to furnish him with a copy of these points of order, because it is necessary to adjourn now.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; I will write them out.

DEATH OF HON. ROBERT C. WICKLIFFE.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce the tragic death of my colleague, Hon. ROBERT C. WICKLIFFE. At some future time I shall ask the House to fix a day to pay tribute to his memory. I wish to send up the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 579.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ROBERT C. WICKLIFFE, a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expense in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 12, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

Mr. LODGE. I call up the unanimous-consent agreement which I offered last evening. I have changed it so as to make it more explicit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the following unanimous-consent agreement be entered into.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, June 17, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will adjourn to Thursday, June 20, 1912; that upon the last-named day, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will adjourn to Monday, June 24, 1912; that upon the last-named day, and immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will adjourn to Thursday, June 27, 1912; that upon the last-named day, and immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will adjourn to Monday, July 1, 1912; and that during the period from June 17 to July 1, 1912, no business, other than routine morning business, will be transacted, and that no bills shall be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered by unanimous consent.

COMMERCE-COURT DECISIONS (S. DOC. NO. 789).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 10th instant, a statement of the number of cases brought in the United States Commerce Court, the questions of law and fact decided, the date of the beginning of each case, the decisions of the court thereon, a list of cases pending, a list of cases appealed from, and a complete set of opinions of the United States Commerce Court, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PERSONNEL OF COMMISSIONS (S. DOC. NO. 794).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of May 14, 1912, a statement as to the number and personnel of commissions now in existence under congressional and Executive authority, the salaries paid to members, officers, and employees of such commissions, etc., which, on motion of Mr. OVERMAN, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SHOE AND LEATHER TRADE IN GERMANY (S. DOC. NO. 791).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report by Commercial Agent Arthur B. Butman containing the result of his investigations of the shoe and leather trade in Germany, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

ELECTRICAL INSTRUMENTS IN ENGLAND (S. DOC. NO. 792).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report by Commercial Agent H. B. Brooks containing the result of his investigations of the trade in electrical instruments in England, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

COTTON GOODS IN THE BALKAN STATES (S. DOC. NO. 793).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report by Commercial Agent Ralph M. Odell, containing the result of his investigations of the trade in cotton goods in the Balkan States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

DAUPHIN ISLAND IMPROVEMENT, ALABAMA.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 23799.

Mr. LODGE. The routine morning business has not been called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No call has been made for any morning business as yet. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that, pending the announcement, the following bill shall be considered.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to submit a report from a committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. This is purely a local bill, which has been passed by the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 23799) to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge, or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the department adjutant, Department of Missouri, United Spanish War Veterans, of Springfield, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Welch Post, No. 422, Department of Ohio, Grand Army of the Republic, of Uhrichsville, Ohio, expressing appreciation and gratitude to Congress for the enactment of recent pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. OLIVER presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce, of Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation prohibiting the use of the Panama Canal by any steamship company in which any railroad has an interest, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Philadelphia and Shenandoah, in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against an appropriation being made to be used for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the convention of the diocese of Bethlehem, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide medical and sanitary relief for the natives of Alaska, which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I present a memorial signed by a large number of manufacturers in New England, which I ask may be read and printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures attached thereto, and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

There being no objection, the memorial was read, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

MAY 29, 1912.

The undersigned, actively engaged in manufacturing in New England, understand that the Covington amendment, so called, to the bill now before Congress regulating the passage of vessels through the Panama Canal provides that "it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever, directly or indirectly, in any common carrier by water with which said railroad does or may compete for traffic."

We believe in the regulation of common carriers by the Government. We do not, however, believe in such restriction or limitation of investment in or the development of steamship lines or coastwise trade generally as this amendment provides.

We deem it of vital importance for the great industries of New England that, under proper restrictions, railroads should be allowed to develop and maintain transportation by water. This is of the highest importance in the transportation of the freight to and from New England points and the South.

We believe that with the opening of the Panama Canal it is of the utmost importance that there shall be adequate and ample transportation facilities by water between New England and the Gulf States and cities.

We therefore respectfully protest against the adoption of the Covington amendment to the Panama Canal bill as unnecessarily impeding the development of transportation by water and as thus retarding the development of New England's commerce with southern and Pacific ports, and we earnestly urge New England Congressmen to do everything in their power to defeat this amendment.

The Bradley & Hubbard Mfg. Co., C. F. Linsley, Secretary; The Aeolian Co., by W. S. Pain, Superintendent; International Silver Co., George H. Wilcox, President; Manning, Bowman & Co., George E. Savage, President; The Miller Bros. Cutlery Co., E. G. Dodwell, President; Kelsey Press Co., F. C. Edgerton, Secretary; Edward Miller & Co., Arthur E. Miller, Vice President; Meriden Grain & Feed Co., by B. W. Collins, President; Meriden Braid Co., B. W. Collins, President; The Meriden Cutlery Co., Homer A. Curtiss, President; E. J. Doolittle; John S. Lane & Son (Inc.), by A. S. Lane, Manager; The H. Wales Lines Co., H. Wales Lines, President; The Charles Parker Co., W. H. Lyon, Treasurer; The Parker Clock Co., W. H. Lyon, President; Parker Bros., W. H. Parker, Vice President; The F. J. Wallace Co., F. J. Wallace; The Wilcox & White Co., J. H. White, President; The E. A. Bliss Co., E. E. Polsey, Treasurer; Foster, Merriam & Co., William Zufour, President; Wusterbarth Bros.; The C. F. Monroe Co., C. F. Monroe, President; The Handel Co., P. J. Handel, President; Meriden Board of Trade Industrial Corps, P. A. Squire, Secretary; The J. J. Niland Co., J. J. Niland; The Meriden Board of Trade, F. A. Stevens, Secretary; The Lyon & Billard Co., John L. Billard, President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Buffalo, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit any railroad or other common carrier from having any interest in any common carrier by water with which it may compete, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Naugatuck, Danbury, and New Britain, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against an appropriation being made for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented a petition of sundry physicians and pharmacists, residents of Montclair, Bloomfield, Glen Ridge, and Verona, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation to maintain the present water rates in the District, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURTON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against an appropriation being made to be used for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of members of the Law and Order Reform League of Antioch, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHILTON presented a petition of members of the Little Kanawha and Ohio Valley Medical Society, of West Virginia, praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WETMORE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Warwick, R. I., remonstrating against an appropriation being made to be used for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ASHURST presented a petition of members of the Mohave County Medical Society, of Arizona, praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GARDNER presented petitions of Cigar Makers' Local Union of Biddeford; of the Maine Textile Workers, of Brunswick; of the Board of Trade of Rockland; and of sundry citizens of Milo, all in the State of Maine, praying for the establishment of a governmental system of postal express, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented a petition of members of the Genesee County Medical Society, of Michigan, praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Munger, Reese, Springwells, Dearborn, Redford, and Au Gres, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on sugar, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Motor Boat Club of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to regulate the equipment of certain motor boats on the navigable waters of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Wexford Grange, No. 914, Patrons of Husbandry, of Sherman, Mich., and a petition of sundry citizens of East Jordan, Mich., praying for the establishment of a parcel-post system, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Saginaw, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the construction of one of the proposed new battleships in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Grand Traverse Lincoln Club, of Traverse City, Mich., remonstrating against the further diversion of the waters of Lake Michigan, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Allen and Quimby, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Council, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the method of directing the work of Government employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5885) supplementing the joint resolution of Congress approved April 30, 1908, entitled "Joint resolution instructing the Attorney General to institute certain suits, etc.," reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 871) thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22006) authorizing the Choctawhatchee River Light & Power Co. to erect a dam across the Choctawhatchee River in Dale County, Ala., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 872) thereon.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) directing the Secretary of the Interior to amend the patent issued to the State of Idaho for lands described herein, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 874) thereon.

ELIZABETH B. PRESTON.

Mr. ASHURST. From the Committee on Pensions I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 5176) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Preston, and I submit a report (No. 870) thereon.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, in line 6, to strike out the word "Captain" and also the name "Ballard" and insert the initial "B."; before the word "Company," in line 7, to strike out "of" and insert the word "captain"; and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth B. Preston, widow of William B. Preston, late captain Company I, Forty-third Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of twenty dollars per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the conference report on House bill 18956, the Army appropriation bill, was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order on that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. The motion is made, and it is necessary under the circumstances to accompany it with a motion that the House be requested to return the papers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct.

Mr. LODGE. I make that motion, and pending it I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question that no quorum is present is raised, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Curtis	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Bristow	Foster	Myers	Stephenson
Brown	Gallinger	Nelson	Sutherland
Bryan	Gardner	Oliver	Swanson
Burnham	Gronna	Overman	Thornton
Burton	Guggenheim	Page	Tillman
Catron	Heyburn	Percy	Townsend
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Perkins	Warren
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter	Watson
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Wetmore
Crawford	Jones	Root
Culberson	Kenyon	Shively
Cullom	Lippitt	Simmons

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from New Jersey enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on the Army appropriation bill was agreed to, which, under the rule, must be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the papers to the Senate, the papers having passed from the possession of the Senate. The Chair thinks the motion should be one motion, as made by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No amendment is necessary. The question is upon agreeing to the motion to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the papers in the case. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not seeing him present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). On this vote I am released from my general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], but I have been informed by at least two Senators and by others who are acquainted with the views of the Senator from Nevada, that we would vote the same way on this question. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE]. He not being present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when Mr. GAMBLE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily absent. I desire to announce that he has a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. In his absence I refrain from voting.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is necessarily absent, and requested me to pair with him upon this vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay," but I withhold my vote in conformity with the agreed pair.

Mr. POMERENE (when his name was called). On this matter I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS]. Therefore I withhold my vote. If the Senator from Tennessee were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], but I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], but on this vote the Senator from Maryland stands paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). On account of my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called). I desire to state that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I inadvertently voted. I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and therefore I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. SHIVELY. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. KERN] is absent on important business. He is paired on this vote with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. President, since my name was called I have been informed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], with whom I am paired, if present, would vote "yea." Therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. My colleague [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE]. He is necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I wish to advise the Senate that I voted with the consent of my general pair, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is absent.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If he were present I should vote "yea." He being absent, I decline to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Ashurst	Curtis	Kenyon	Reed
Bacon	Gardner	Lodge	Root
Bristow	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Brown	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Percy	Sutherland
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thornton
Cummins	Jones	Poindexter	Townsend

NAYS—29.

Bourne	du Pont	Oliver	Stephenson
Burnham	Fletcher	Overman	Swanson
Catron	Foster	Page	Tillman
Chamberlain	Gronna	Shively	Warren
Crawford	Guggenheim	Simmons	Wetmore
Culberson	Lorimer	Smith, Ariz.
Cullom	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Dillingham	Myers	Smith, S. C.

NOT VOTING—37.

Bailey	Crane	Lippitt	Richardson
Bankhead	Davis	McCumber	Sanders
Borah	Dixon	McLean	Smith, Md.
Bradley	Fall	Newlands	Stone
Brandegee	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Watson

Bryan	Heyburn	Paynter	Works
Chilton	Kern	Penrose
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Pomerene
Clarke, Ark.	Lea	Rayner

So the motion of Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I now ask that the Senate take up the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the morning business been closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business has not yet been closed.

Mr. WARREN. Then I will withhold the motion. I supposed that the morning business had closed.

INTERNATIONAL MARITIME CONFERENCE.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 299) proposing an international maritime conference, to report it with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Foreign Relations were, on page 1, line 3, after the enacting clause, to strike out "That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested to ascertain the opinions of maritime nations upon the desirability of an international maritime conference, to meet at Washington on the invitation of the United States," and insert, "That the President be authorized to convey to maritime nations the desire of Congress that an international maritime conference be held, and that he be also authorized to appoint commissioners to represent the United States at any such conference, whether called by the United States or any other nation, the purpose of said conference being"; in line 15, after the word "appliances," to strike out "regulations concerning accommodations for steerage passengers and crews"; on page 2, line 5, after the word "navigation," to strike out "the establishment of a patrol system in the region of ice, or elsewhere, or of a system of convoys for ocean-going vessels, or of a relief station at Cape Race or elsewhere, or of" and insert "the establishment of"; and on page 2, after line 10, to strike out "SEC. 2. That the President is hereby further requested to communicate to Congress at the earliest possible time the substance of the replies of maritime nations, with his recommendations upon the desirability of calling an international maritime conference at Washington for the purposes named" and insert: "SEC. 2. That in case such international maritime conference shall be called by the United States or any other nation the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the expenses of the representatives of the United States at said conference," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the President be authorized to convey to maritime nations the desire of Congress that an international maritime conference be held, and that he be also authorized to appoint commissioners to represent the United States at any such conference, whether called by the United States or any other nation, the purpose of said conference being to consider uniform laws and regulations for the greater security of life and property on merchant vessels at sea, including, if practicable, regulations to establish standards of efficiency of the officers and crews of merchant vessels and the manning of such vessels; regulations for the construction and inspection of hulls, boilers, and machinery; regulations for equipment of ocean steamers with radio apparatus, searchlights, submarine bells, lifeboats, and other life-saving and fire-extinguishing appliances; regulations concerning lights, sound signals, steering and sailing rules; regulations for an international system of reporting and disseminating information relating to aids and perils to navigation; the establishment of lane routes to be followed by trans-Atlantic steamers; and such other matters relating to the security of life and property at sea as may be proposed.

SEC. 2. That in case such international maritime conference shall be called by the United States or any other nation the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expenses of the representatives of the United States at said conference.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator presenting this report whether or not the action of this maritime conference would be submitted to the Congress of the United States for approval?

Mr. LODGE. It would have to be; there could be no agreement made without its submission to Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. After the maritime conference have agreed upon a report?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. On behalf of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] I report from the Committee on Naval Affairs the bill (S. 6453) to amend an act entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States," approved March 3, 1899, to report it with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 873) thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. What is this bill, and how did it come up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On a request for unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that while I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, I shall be compelled to object to bills taking the time that this bill has occupied in its reading until we can dispose of some of the appropriation bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine give his attention for a moment? The Secretary advises the Chair that no amendment is indicated in the bill, although upon the outside of it the statement is written that it is reported with an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. The bill was given to me by the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I have not examined it.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that objection has already been made to the consideration of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No objection has yet been made.

Mr. REED. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go to the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand that the bill has been objected to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] objected to the present consideration of the bill, and it has gone to the calendar.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am instructed by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, to report it favorably, with amendments.

There are numerous amendments to the House bill indicated on the bill which I have reported, and I take this occasion to state that the bill was made in the committee, section by section, each section being voted upon separately. Each section of the bill commanded the support of a majority of the committee, but there was no majority in the committee for the entire bill. I make that statement because when I say "I report favorably the bill," the committee reports the bill, perhaps it would be more exact to say, without recommendation of the entire contents of the bill, and I suppose that the bill will have to be made upon the floor of the Senate.

The situation in the committee, with differences of opinion as to the question of tolls, as to the question of the form of the civil government, and as to the question of the operation of steamships in which railroad companies were interested, was such that I do not think it could be fairly stated that it is the favorable report of the entire bill.

The situation was also such, as I have indicated, that it was impossible to prepare a written report which would command the votes and the approval of a majority of the committee.

The members of the committee decided that there should be no written report, and I hardly think one is necessary, for the matters which will be contested, because of contention with respect to the bill, are all amply covered by the report of the House committee and the views of the minority thereof.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator that my understanding of this matter is that there was a favorable report on the part of the committee, or rather favorable action on the part of the committee, and the report should be a favorable report with amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was so stated, and then I proceeded to state my understanding of the situation, which was that the report was favorable, that the bill should be reported for the purpose of getting it before the Senate, but that there was not a majority of the committee which indorsed everything in the bill. That is my understanding of the situation. If the Senator has a different one I should like him to state it.

Mr. SIMMONS. There were disagreements in the committee and there were amendments adopted, but as amended I understood the committee to approve the bill, and therefore the report ought to be a favorable report with amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not so understand it, and I personally stated that I reserved the right to offer amendments on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Surely. That right is reserved to every Senator, but that does not affect the fact——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be said to be pro forma a favorable report, but a favorable report, where each member of the committee reserves the right to offer amendments, did not seem to me to be the kind of a favorable report that is the ordinary kind of a favorable report.

I want also to state, in view of the necessity for the earliest possible action upon this matter, that I shall attempt to call up the bill at the earliest possible minute not to interfere with appropriation bills and other privileged matters.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to state in connection with this report that, as I understand, there were very sharp differences in the committee, especially as to section 11 of the bill which came from the House, relating to the control of steamship lines by railroads. The House bill provided that no railroad should own or control, directly or indirectly, any steamship line with which it did or might compete, and the amendment of that provision was that which brought out the sharp differences of opinion.

I think I may state that three views existed: One in favor of reporting the House provision as it was in the bill—section 11; another, limiting this inhibition as to ships passing through the canal; and another opposed to any restriction whatever over the railroads owning steamship lines.

I desire to say that for myself I shall support section 11 of the bill as it came from the House, believing that it is the best.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, in view of the various remarks which have been made about the report on the Panama Canal bill, I wish to say that in my opinion the bill, with regard to the remission of tolls on American vessels, is in violation of our treaty with Great Britain, and I shall take occasion at an appropriate time hereafter to give my reasons for that belief.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the discussion of the bill may go over until the bill is regularly before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar.

MEXICAN COTTON-BOLL WEEVIL.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing to which was referred House concurrent resolution 47, I report it favorably, and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 30,000 copies of the message of the President of the United States of date February 12, 1912, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting a report on the Mexican cotton-boll weevil, together with said report (S. Doc. No. 305), of which 10,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate to be distributed through the Senate document room, and 20,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives to be distributed through the House document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, one moment. I want to know if the concurrent resolution is up for consideration and how it comes up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a concurrent resolution just reported from the Committee on Printing for which present consideration is asked. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. I shall not object to it if it does not lead to debate. If it does, I certainly shall have to object.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 7106) providing the sum of $80,000 for the erection of a public building at Cheboygan, Mich.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 7107) for the relief of Samuel F. Curtis; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 7108) granting a pension to Ada M. Wade;

A bill (S. 7109) granting a pension to Dallas Garner;

A bill (S. 7110) granting an increase of pension to Howard C. Kibbee;

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL (H. R. 25069).

Mr. BURNHAM submitted an amendment providing for the appointment of two civilian instructors in the Revenue-Cutter Service, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN (for Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for a survey of the sewer system at Hot Springs abutting the Hot Springs Reservation, Ark., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $77.68 to pay Benjamin S. Hanchett, of Grand Rapids, Mich., for money expended for necessary expenses while attending the meetings of the Assay Commission, March, 1905, Philadelphia, Pa., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the expenses of the International Conference on Maritime Law at Brussels in 1912, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRYAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,588 for paving White Street fronting on the United States Military Barracks, Key West, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CHILTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

DESIGNATION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to make a request for unanimous consent that during the absences of the Vice President the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] be President pro tempore of the Senate until July 5; and that during the absences of the Vice President from July 5 until the close of the month the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] be President pro tempore.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 340), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate has elected AUGUSTUS O. BACON, a Senator from the State of Georgia, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice President, from June 13, 1912, to July 5, 1912, both inclusive.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 341), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate has elected AUGUSTUS O. BACON, a Senator from the State of Georgia, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice President, from June 13, 1912, to July 5, 1912, both inclusive.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 342), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate has elected JACOB H. GALLINGER, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice President, from July 6, 1912, to July 31, 1912, both inclusive.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 343), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate has elected JACOB H. GALLINGER, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice President, from July 6, 1912, to July 31, 1912, both inclusive.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN ALASKA (S. DOC. NO. 790).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Information comes of a reliable character that through the action of a volcano in the neighborhood of Kodiak, Alaska, more than a thousand people are rendered homeless, and unless aid can be given them they are likely to suffer severely. I ask, therefore, an immediate emergency appropriation, to be expended by the Revenue-Cutter Service under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The danger is said to be in the neighborhood of large salmon canneries, and should the streams of the country be clogged and poisoned, as is likely, by the volcanic explosion, loss of life is certain to ensue unless relief is granted.

I recommend that an appropriation of $100,000 be made for this purpose.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 12, 1912.

ANTI-INJUNCTION BILL.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, preceding the motion I desire to make, I wish to say that four years ago the Democratic Party at Denver, while in convention, declared themselves as opposed to government by injunction. It was in our platform that we would advance legislation tending to give the people of this country that relief. It was our political creed. Though our party and candidate received 6,500,000 votes, we were defeated. The Republican Party has been in control of President, Senate, and House since, except the past year in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. To what is the Senator addressing his remarks; what business?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Beg pardon.

Mr. WARREN. What is the business before the Senate to which the Senator is addressing his remarks?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am about to make a motion, and this is prefacing my motion or preliminary to my motion.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will give us the motion, so that we will know what is before the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will give you the motion in a very few words. It may be unpleasant, but I am going to do it.

On the 15th of May, last, that body passed by an overwhelming vote the bill H. R. 23635. Since then it has slept the sleep of the dead in the arms of the Judiciary Committee of this body. In a few weeks both parties will again be in convention. Shall party declarations and party platforms be empty and idle words? What we shall again declare, I know not.

But I mean, as far as I can control, my party shall redeem that pledge.

To that end I move that the Committee on the Judiciary be relieved from the further consideration of House bill 23635, known as the Clayton anti-injunction bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion will have to lie over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; if objection is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion lies over.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that there be laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill commonly called the metal schedule bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to amendments 1 and 2 and disagreeing to amendments 3 and 4 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and request a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate recede from its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLAPP. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Lodge	Simmons
Bacon	Curtis	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Bourne	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Nelson	Smoot
Brown	Gardner	Oliver	Stephenson
Burnham	Gore	Overman	Sutherland
Burton	Gronna	Page	Swanson
Catron	Guggenheim	Percy	Townsend
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Perkins	Warren
Chilton	Hitchcock	Poindexter	Watson
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Pomerene	Wetmore
Crawford	Johnston, Ala.	Reed
Culberson	Jones	Root
Cullom	Lippitt	Shively

Mr. WARREN. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. CLARK] is absent from the Senate on public business.

Mr. OLIVER. My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is necessarily absent from the city. I make this announcement for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the vote for a moment on the question of receding. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the amendment in disagreement is the amendment made by the Senate putting on the metal-schedule bill the repeal of the reciprocity act, and the motion to recede is a motion to recede from that amendment.

That is all I desire to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to recede from the amendments of the Senate, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to say a single word on this motion, having no disposition whatever to delay its consideration.

When this matter was before the Senate a few days ago it was fully debated. The Senate did not act hastily at all about the amendment that was placed on this bill. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] offered an amendment repealing the so-called reciprocity act, to which I offered an amendment, and that amendment was further amended on motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The Senate took a vote and solemnly voted 37 to 27 to amend the bill so as to repeal the reciprocity act.

I confess, Mr. President, that I can see no good reason why the Senate should reverse itself on this matter. It was not a hasty conclusion, and I trust, Mr. President, that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina may not prevail.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. Of course this matter is presented to us in two aspects. One is the general aspect of the repeal of the law in all its features with, I believe, one exception. The law is not now operative by reason of the fact that the Canadian Government has not agreed to it. There is, however, one feature of that law which is now operative, is there not?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator kindly state what that is?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is admitting certain classes of paper free.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was not in the Senate Chamber when the Senate amendment repealing Canadian reciprocity was discussed several days since, but entered in time only to vote, so I did not have an opportunity to express my views on that amendment. I voted for Canadian reciprocity after a most careful and conscientious consideration of it, believing that that measure was not inimical to the best interests of our farmers or of any other class of our people. I believed then, as I do now, that this was a step in the direction of closer relations between Canada and the United States, which would result in greater good to the people of both nations. I voted, however, for the original bill believing it meant reciprocity and that it was not a unilateral contract. In discussing the measure when it was up for passage I considered the effect upon the measure which would result if this country approved it and Canada afterwards rejected it. I felt that the clear intent of the contracting parties was that the treaty should be operative when, and only when, both nations had approved it. I recall that the senior Senator from Iowa contended that certain provisions of the bill would, if adopted by the United States, be binding upon that country even though Canada should afterwards reject the treaty. I did not agree with him then, but I am now convinced that I was mistaken and I desire at the earliest opportunity to annul this unilateral contract. If reciprocity is ever to be a binding principle between Canada and the United States with my support, it must be such a measure as will secure reciprocal benefits to both countries, and such benefits must be clear and unquestioned. It is for these reasons that I vote to retain the repealing amendment and not for purposes of delay or to prevent the final determination of the metal-tariff bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I think I ought to say, with respect to the amendment which I proposed and which was accepted by the Senator from New Hampshire, that the feeling on the part of some people—I do not think, however, within the Senate—that there would be any confusion respecting the subject if the amendment were to become a law is not well founded.

I offered an amendment providing that hereafter all the paper described in section 2 should be admitted with a duty of $2 per ton. It has been thought that this would not admit paper from other countries at that rate of duty. I believe this to be a misapprehension. The section to which we refer provides that news-print paper and other paper valued at not more than 4 cents per pound shall be admitted free of duty under certain conditions. My amendment provides that such paper—that is, news-print paper and other paper of the value of not more than 4 cents per pound—shall be admitted at the rate of $2 per ton.

It is manifest that if this provision becomes a law under the favored-nation clause of all our treaties such paper would be admitted at a similar or the same rate of duty. The only reason why the free admission of paper provided in the reciprocity act does not apply or can not be taken advantage of by other countries is that by some sort of fiction it is held that this was a part of an arrangement with Canada especially and that we received some consideration for the extension of this privilege that other nations have not conferred upon us. But there can be no doubt whatsoever that if the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from North Dakota, with the addition of the amendment which I proposed and was accepted, becomes a law news-print paper and other paper of the value of 4 cents per pound or less will come into the United States from all the world at the rate of $2 per ton.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, I am interested in the passage of the metal bill, as it is called, as it passed the Senate, with the amendment providing for the repeal of Canadian reciprocity and also reducing the duty upon print paper and other paper of the value of less than 4 cents a pound.

I believed when the reciprocity act was under consideration that the contract which was made in section 2 of that act was unilateral and that it did not operate to the advantage of this country or the paper and pulp manufacturers of this country, because we were not allowed admission to the markets of Canada.

From the examination I have made, coming from a State which stands second in the United States in the manufacture of pulp and paper and manufacturing a great deal of paper which would be admitted by this act, I then felt that the markets of Canada should be opened to our manufactures if we open ours to them.

Afer examining the report of the Tariff Board upon the cost of the production of pulp and paper in this country, I believed from that and such other examinations as I could make that we can manufacture print paper in this country, and in my State of Maine, as cheaply as anywhere in the world, and that we do not need any duty to protect us against the importation of pulp or paper from the Dominion of Canada. I refer in that statement to the pulp and paper mills which are efficiently managed and economically operated in accordance with the rules of good business management with up-to-date equipment. The report of the Tariff Board shows conclusively that mills so equipped and operated are able to compete and hold their own with the pulp and paper mills of Canada.

For that reason I felt that we should make the agreement, if possible, one which would admit pulp and paper from the United States to Canada, and I favor the adoption of what was then known as the Root amendment; but that failing to be adopted I voted for the passage of the bill.

When the matter was before the Senate, a few days since, I then voted for the amendment. I appreciated then as I do now that it was offered partly to embarrass the passage of the metal bill, because it came from those who are opposed to the passage of the metal bill.

Since the action of the House, and feeling as I do that this amendment is offered for the purpose of embarrassing the passage of the metal bill at this time, I shall not vote for the adoption of the amendment, but shall vote to recede from the former action of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, when I first offered the amendment to repeal the reciprocity act I offered it in good faith, not only from the standpoint of a Republican, one who believes in the protective policy, but from the standpoint of doing justice to all the industries of this country. I will not admit or agree to the statement made, at least so far as I am concerned, that it was not offered in good faith. To show the feeling of the people of my State, I am going to ask to have a letter read from a staunch Democrat, one of the ablest and best men of my State. I will send this letter to the Secretary's desk and have it read in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letter sent to the desk.

Mr. GRONNA. I have two letters; I wish to have the letter addressed to me personally read first, and then the letter addressed to the ex-governor of the State of Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read accordingly.

The Secretary read the first letter, as follows:

ELK VALLEY FARMING CO.,
Larimore, N. Dak., June 4, 1912.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA.
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR:

* * * * * * *

I see you are nobly keeping up the fight for the repeal of President Taft's—correctly branded by you as—"iniquitous measure," and which killed him politically. You are richly deserving and will receive the thanks of the farmers of the whole United States.

I also inclose a copy of a letter I recently sent to Gov. Francis, of Missouri, whom I have known since he left school. He has been successful in both finances and politics, until the old mossbacks of Missouri turned him down because he didn't vote for free silver. Gov. Francis requested my son Clay and me to speak well of CHAMP CLARK. Personally I admire Mr. CLARK, but, as I have stated in my letter to Gov. Francis, I believe the farmers will defeat any candidate who favors annexation and reciprocity.

If Senator STONE cares to read my letter to Gov. Francis, you may let him do so, but don't press it on him, or anyone else.

Most truly, yours,

N. G. LARIMORE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the second letter sent to the desk.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I feel compelled to call attention to the impropriety of reading into our records language of that kind—that "the President had fixed Congress"—and then the last phrase. I appeal to the Senator from North Dakota on this question.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that those words be stricken out of the letter.

Mr. HEYBURN. They should not be read into our records.

Mr. GRONNA. No; I admit that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the objectionable matter be stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. The disrespectful language directed against the President.

Mr. REED. I suggest, Mr. President, that both those letters, particularly the one that could not be read, ought to be referred to the Republican national committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, following the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], I will say that it is not my intention to incorporate anything into the RECORD that is objectionable.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it goes into the RECORD, unfortunately, as it is being read. The matter is reported in the RECORD.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I intended to strike those sentences out.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I think it would have been well to have stricken them out before they were read. There should be no disrespect used toward the President of the United States in this body.

Mr. GRONNA. Not at all. Now, Mr. President, as I said at the outset, this letter is written by an honored citizen of my State. It was not his intention to cast any reflection or to do anyone an injustice. The letter is only introduced to show that it is not only the Republicans who are opposed to reciprocity, but that Democrats are also opposed to it. I will repeat that this letter was written by a distinguished man from Larimore, N. Dak., who is a Democrat. There is absolutely no politics in it. The Democrats of my State were as much opposed to reciprocity as were the Republicans, because they recognized that it was an unjust measure.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend to object to the reading of the sentiments that related to business affairs or the effect of political action upon business affairs. I am in sympathy with the proposition to repeal the reciprocity act. In fact, the first day of this session of the Senate I introduced a bill that was favorably reported from the Committee on Finance and is now on the calendar, providing for the repeal of that act. So I do not desire that the Senator shall consider that I am objecting to the reading of anything, except those expressions that are disrespectful to the President of the United States or to this body.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say that if I had known this matter was to come up this morning I should have run through the letter, taken my pencil, and stricken these sentences out myself, but I overlooked doing it. I ask unanimous consent that they be stricken out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it strikes me that the letter of this gentleman to Gov. Francis has not any particular bearing on this question, and I will ask the Senator from North Dakota if he will not request that the letter to Gov. Francis, a portion of which has been read, shall be withheld from the RECORD?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the mutilation of the letter will not help it much. It seems to be a political argument.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is not a political argument; it is a financial argument. I wish to have the remainder of the letter read. I am sure that there is nothing disrespectful in the remainder of the letter. I can assure the Senator from New Hampshire that there is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course the letter is being read by unanimous consent. If there is objection, it will not be further read.

Mr. GALLINGER. If any part of it is to appear I have no objection to the balance of it being read, but it seems to me that the Senator's position would not be weakened if he asked unanimous consent to withdraw the letter to Gov. Francis and not have it appear in the RECORD. The former letter from his constituent I think is a proper letter, and that will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. GRONNA. This letter was written by the same person.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that.

Mr. GRONNA. And a copy of the letter to Gov. Francis was sent to me for the purpose of showing it, as he says in his letter, to Senators. I am willing to take out anything that is objectionable, and shall be very glad to do so. There is nothing disrespectful in the letter, the Senator from New Hampshire will agree with me that it simply pertains to business, and I desire to have it read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, what procedure does the Senator propose to adopt to have the objectionable portion of the letter stricken out?

Mr. GRONNA. There are only two sentences in the letter which in any way can be objectionable to anyone, and I have asked unanimous consent, or shall ask unanimous consent, to strike out that portion of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the better way, perhaps, would be for the Senator to withdraw the letter and at his desk correct it.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe that unanimous consent has been given for the reading of the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not put a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota requested the Secretary to read. The rule provides that when the reading of a paper is called for and objected to it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate without debate.

Mr. GRONNA. I am familiar with the rule. I ask that the letter be returned to me, and I shall read it in my own time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw his request for unanimous consent to strike out the phrases objected to, or does he still ask for that consent? The Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that at present the phrases objected to are in the RECORD, and unless they are expunged they will appear in it.

Mr. GRONNA. I withdraw the entire letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota withdraws the entire letter from the RECORD and will read such portions of it himself as he cares to do.

Mr. HEYBURN. One moment. Now, Mr. President, will that have the effect of eliminating from the RECORD the portions of the letter that have been already read, so that they will not remain in the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. The Senator from North Dakota withdraws from the RECORD the entire letter, and that includes such portions of it as have been read.

Mr. HEYBURN. And it will not be reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will not be reported.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I sent this letter in the first place to the Secretary's desk to have it read because the Secretary is a better reader than I am; but, if the Senate will hear me, I shall try to read at least part of it. I think it is a splendid letter:

My son Clay and I have been working among our people in the interest of CHAMP CLARK. We both find a prejudice against him on account of his avowed sympathy with reciprocity and even annexation of all outdoors. I assure them that Mr. CLARK is too honorable a man to wish to destroy any important interest to advance a political policy—

The Senator from Missouri can certainly have no objection to that statement—that he would give the farmers an opportunity to show him the great wrong reciprocity and annexation would inflict on them and through them to the whole country. The Los Angeles Times and the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, while reciprocity was pending before Congress, denounced reciprocity almost daily, * * * that neither ancient or modern history had a parallel to such a colossal robbery on the farmers as reciprocity contemplated.

Mr. Taft claimed that reciprocity was intended to reduce the high cost of living by reducing the price of bread. The annual per capita consumption of wheat is about 6 bushels. Reduce wheat from $1 to 50 cents, and the saving is less than 1 cent a day; reduce the wage of the mechanic and laborer from an average of $3 to $1.50—the latter being the ruling price when wheat sold at 60 cents—where would labor be benefited by this reduction in the price of wheat? I went to Washington to fight reciprocity, but found——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I prefer not to yield until I have read the letter, and then I will be glad to yield.

Mr. REED. Well, it would be——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is out of order.

Mr. REED. I am addressing myself to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. LODGE. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LODGE. Has he yielded it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has declined to yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I will gladly yield to him after I have read this letter:

I went to Washington to fight reciprocity, but found corralled enough Republicans and Democrats to rush the bill through before the country could get to understand what it meant. The farmers are beginning to realize its meaning, as is shown in the vote against Taft. But for reciprocity Taft would have had a walkover for the nomination. North Dakota voted between 30 and 40 to 1 against Taft. Farmers are not yet fully awake to the extent of the calamity reciprocity would have brought on them, but before the election enough of them will have their eyes opened to send any man of any party with outspoken reciprocity proclivities to the scrap pile. The time is past when, as has been the custom, politicians can ignore the farmer and his interests and * * * refuse him an audience. When the farmers pull together they hold the key and are beginning to see the necessity of this as their only safety from annihilation.

* * * * * * *

You have been in the grain business long enough to know that to dump the Canadian crop on our markets would at once drop our prices to that of Winnipeg, then the bears would force prices down to 50 or 60 cents, as was done when John Williams, Ben Barnes, John Kaufman, and others made their millions on the short side. The Canadian wheat on top of ours would make the load too heavy for the bulls to carry. For the past few years the country has been prosperous because of the prosperity of the farmer. The laboring man is getting the highest wages ever known. When we sold our wheat at 60 cents per bushel farm hands were plentiful at from $15 to $20 a month. Now we have difficulty in getting a supply of men at $35 to $40 per month with board. Pauperize the farmer, as reciprocity would do, by first robbing him of $50,000,000 annually on barley * * *——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. GRONNA. I prefer not to yield until I am through with the letter.

* * * Two hundred million to $300,000,000 on wheat by reducing the price to 60 cents or lower. You remember that prior to the settling of the West and the northwestern States, New England and Virginia farm lands were selling at from $150 to $200 per acre, but that after the new lands, with their virgin soil, got to producing 35 to 40 bushels of wheat an acre by just scratching the surface, wheat, with the aid of the "bears," declined to 50 and 60 cents, and New England and Virginia farmers could not compete, then those farms could be bought for less than the buildings cost. With the untold millions of acres of Canadian lands and their virgin soil, capable of raising a thousand millions annually, with our markets open, history would repeat itself—our farm produce and our grain-growing lands would be depreciated 50 per cent. The country merchant, then the city merchant, and banker would all feel the shock. The mechanic and laborer would be hunting in vain for work at one-half or less present wages. Many contend that Liverpool controls prices of wheat for the world. You know that Liverpool is simply a mirror that reflects conditions in other countries. To illustrate: When reciprocity was pending before Congress dispatches from Chicago stated that the agitation of reciprocity had caused a decline in wheat in the Chicago market of 16½ cents per bushel. Liverpool followed our decline and Winnipeg followed Liverpool, proving two things; first, that Liverpool is only a mirror, and, second, that dumping Canadian wheat on our markets would, with the assistance of the "bears," force prices down and their wheat down with ours, and they would suffer with the American farmer. I showed this point to Premier Borden and the Canadian newspapers.

There may be some who disagree with my conclusions. To any such I will give an opportunity, if I am wrong, to make a few hundred thousand dollars. The Elk Valley Farming Co. owns approximately 15,000 acres of land free of incumbrance in the Red River Valley of North Dakota. Mr. Hill, at a banquet in Grand Forks in 1911, stated that Red River Valley lands were intrinsically worth $150 to $200 an acre.

The Elk Valley Farming Co. will place deeds for all its lands in escrow at $60 an acre to be accepted if reciprocity or annexation becomes a law, the acceptor to put up a bond for half a million dollars to guarantee the payment of $60 an acre for these lands. Without reciprocity or annexation this land is not for sale at any price.

Now, Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the letter read by the Senator keeps constantly referring to "50-cent wheat if we had reciprocity." Does the Senator himself claim that reciprocity would have produced 50-cent wheat in this country? Or is that merely an extravagance on the part of this writer?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is true that on the very day reciprocity was defeated by the Canadian people wheat advanced 8½ cents a bushel in the markets of Duluth and Minneapolis.

Mr. REED. That is not the question, Mr. President. I am not discussing the narrow question of whether reciprocity might have affected the price of wheat by a cent or two cents or three or four cents a bushel. I am asking the Senator if he proposes to put his senatorial O. K. upon the statement that reciprocity would have produced 50-cent wheat. I do not think the Senator will say that.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not know; I am not going to fix the price. But I do know the price would be lower with reciprocity with Canada, which means free trade with Canada, and you might just as well say free trade with the whole world, so far as wheat is concerned, or any other agricultural product; and it certainly would result in a great loss to the farming industry of this country.

Mr. REED. I still think the Senator might be generous enough to give me a categorical answer to the question whether he concurs in the statement of this writer that reciprocity would have given us 50-cent wheat. I do not think the Senator will say that, but I should like to know.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I entirely concur in the statements made by Mr. Larimore.

Mr. REED. Entirely?

Mr. GRONNA. I concur in the statements made by him. Of course that is simply my opinion.

Mr. REED. Just one further question: Of course reciprocity failed to become a law as to agricultural products, because it was not accepted by Canada; and the proposition before us now relates only to wood pulp and paper. Does the Senator think if we were to refuse to concur, to insist upon our amendment made in the Senate, which affects only wood pulp and paper, that would put wheat down to 50 cents a bushel?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator knows as well as I do that the reciprocity agreement had reference to more than print paper.

Mr. REED. I am speaking about the part that is alive, if the Senator will permit me. Reciprocity was defeated by the act of Canada.

Mr. GRONNA. It is all alive, Mr. President. There is a campaign going on in Canada to-day, as the Senator probably knows, to adopt reciprocity. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is out making speeches over the western part of the country, and the issue there is reciprocity. That is the issue in Canada now.

Mr. REED. The Senator thinks it is now a live issue?

Mr. GRONNA. It is a live issue; very much so.

Mr. REED. Just one further question: I noticed that the Senator, in reading the letter, struck out a good many parts of it. I should like to know what he struck out, so that we may consider it all together.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had the letter sent to the desk to be read. I do not think any of the language used is objectionable, but there was objection to one or two sentences, so I struck them out. I assure the Senator I always want to be as courteous as I possibly can to the Senate; so I struck out such words as I thought ought to be stricken out.

That is all I have to say, Mr. President. I do not admit that this amendment which was offered by myself was offered to defeat any legislation. I voted for the bill in the Senate; and I want to see this law repealed because, as I have said, it is an unfair and an unjust measure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one further question. Since the Senator has stated that he regards reciprocity as still a live issue, I can see a reason for a renewal of the agitation with reference to the merits of the reciprocity bill from the Senator's standpoint. But does not the Senator think the proper way to meet a great question of that kind is by a direct bill instead of attaching it as a rider to a tariff measure relating to an entirely different subject?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to be frank with the Senator from Missouri. If conditions were such that a separate bill could be passed—if I believed both Houses of Congress would concur in my views and pass such a bill—I should be very glad to have it passed. But I am sure the Senator from Missouri will agree with me that at least during this session the only way we can repeal this law is by placing a repealing clause on some of these other bills.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator believe that will jeopardize the bill after it leaves Congress and goes to the other department of the Government?

Mr. GRONNA. No, Mr. President. I think those who believe in protection, at least, and who voted for this measure, will be very glad to have an opportunity to purge themselves and to vote now to repeal it.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not catch my question. I asked whether the Senator does not believe that if this amendment is attached to the steel bill, that fact will jeopardize the steel bill after it leaves Congress and goes to the other department of the Government and will possibly result in a veto?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not, Mr. President. I do not know what the House will do; I do not know what the President will do; but I entertain the hope that President Taft will be very glad to sign the bill with a provision of this kind in it.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator's position to be that there are a great many Senators and Congressmen who would like to purge themselves of the obloquy attaching to them because they voted for reciprocity. If that is true, it ought to insure the passage here of the measure as a separate bill. The Senator also thinks the President would like to purge himself in the same way, and that he would not be opposed to it.

Under those circumstances, I insist that it is extremely illogical to attach this measure to the steel bill—first, because it does not belong there; second, because it might result in a veto of the steel bill because the reciprocity provision was added; and third, because, if the President is now in the contrite frame of mind that the Senator thinks he is, and is anxious to repeal the reciprocity bill, the course proposed might result in his vetoing the bill which does repeal it, because he might be opposed to the steel bill. Thus the Senator may jeopardize the repeal of reciprocity by adding it to a measure which the President may veto.

I think if the Senator is right, and if there has been a complete revulsion of sentiment and a revolution of opinion, and Congress now desires to purge itself of reciprocity, and the President does also, the Senator ought not to jeopardize his reciprocity reform by compelling the President either to veto it or to sign a steel bill which the President may desire to veto.

If the Senator be right, he ought to consent to striking out this amendment, let the steel bill go to the President alone, and then bring forward his reciprocity repeal. If he be correct, it will pass both Houses of Congress, and the President will restore himself to public confidence by signing it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri could assure me that the House would pass a bill repealing the reciprocity act, I should be very glad to withdraw that feature from this bill and let it be passed separately.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the Senate will refuse to recede from the position it took when this matter was up before. I think one of the most unfortunate attempts at legislation that has been made in recent years was this proposed reciprocal legislation with Canada.

In the first place, Mr. President, I think it is a fair accusation to make to say that the real motive back of the whole measure was not reciprocity in agricultural products. I believe it is a fair charge and accusation to make that that part of the bill was nothing more nor less than a subterfuge to make the people through the populous portions of the United States believe they were going to get some advantages in the way of cheaper living, and that the real purpose of that measure from beginning to end was to secure what was found in section 2, in relation to the importation from Canada of print paper and pulp.

I say that because this remarkable condition is found in that legislation: Section 2 became a law upon the approval of the President, and was not at all contingent upon the action taken by Canada; and those who were interested in section 2 secured the object they sought, while the reciprocal provision depended upon the acceptance of the proposition by Canada.

I insist that that was not an act of fair, open, candid treatment of the agricultural interests of this country, and was an indirect way of getting what ought to have been asked openly and frankly upon its merits, as a separate piece of legislation, without being coupled with this proposition for reciprocity. On that account I shall have no regrets if section 2 shall go down with the first section of the bill.

In the second place, the act never was entitled to go before the country as a fair proposition for reciprocity. I am willing to say here and now that if we could have unrestrained and full reciprocal trade with Canada, with the conditions existing as they do on both sides of the line in relation to production and labor and cost, the advantages to the United States as a whole might fairly balance whatever injuries might follow. But this was no such bill as that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the Senator is aware of the fact that Canada would not agree to free trade between that country and this.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well. Then I say to the Senator from New Hampshire that if Canada would not agree to that measure of full and fair reciprocity which would be just to both countries, and which might be sustained, we had better abandon all this talk about reciprocity with Canada. But I say this proposition, concealing this sort of legislation under the cloak of reciprocity while it made the agricultural interests of this country its victim, was obtaining goods by means of false pretenses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as the Senator probably knows, I fully agree with him on that point. It was not reciprocity.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was not.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was pretended reciprocity, without the substance.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, these protests that have come with no uncertain sound from North Dakota and all along the Canadian border and the Northwest, from earnest people and sincere people and struggling people that are developing the great empire out there, are not based on mere matters of imagination.

They are intensely in earnest about it, and it has certainly been most unfortunate for those who put a proposition of that kind before this country. Every opportunity the people out there have had to make their protest has shown what they thought about it. It has not been Republican. A more un-Republican measure, a more heretical measure so far as the belief of Republicans in protection is concerned, was never recognized by this side of the Chamber than the so-called reciprocal proposition with Canada. I hope that there will be no hesitation in standing firmly by the record made the other day by the Senate upon this proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20182) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside until the Senate has acted upon the motion to recede from the amendments of the Senate to the metal-schedule bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. WARREN. I wish the Senator would extend his request so that we can finish the little work on the legislative appropriation bill, and if he does not wish to lay the unfinished business aside for the day that he will include that bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will not insist upon that. The Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has been here expecting to speak on the chemical schedule bill—now, this is the third day.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Maine is to be accommodated, I am perfectly willing that he shall make his speech on the appropriation bill, but I do not like to sidetrack that business.

Mr. SIMMONS. With that understanding I will agree to that suggestion.

Mr. WARREN. So that there will be no misunderstanding, I shall move, as soon as the matter of the Senate amendments to the metal bill is disposed of, to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and when it is up, if the Senator from Maine wishes to proceed, of course he has that right, and I shall not make a contest against it. But this is the ninth day we have had the appropriation bill before the Senate, and I submit to the Senator from North Carolina himself that good orderly business requires that we shall finish it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the ninth day, also, that we have yielded to the Senator to go on with the appropriation bill, when we were very anxious to proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. WARREN. When the Senator says he has yielded it is true that he has done so, and very generously, but I might as well say that the time may come when the Senate will have to decide whether the appropriation bill shall have the right of way and can be displaced by other bills. I hope that time will not come, because——

Mr. SIMMONS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, I will consent that after this vote is taken the Senator from Wyoming shall call up the appropriation bill, with the understanding that as soon as it is acted upon then I shall call up the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that this is a unanimous consent that we shall take up the tariff bill at the conclusion of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Chair is that the Senator from North Carolina has asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and he has had some understanding with the Senator from Wyoming that the Senator from Wyoming will then move to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the motion that is now before the Senate is disposed of and until action is had upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriaton bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. SMOOT. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business with a provision attached to it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was asking unanimous consent that it be laid aside until certain things happened.

Mr. SMOOT. Then it will be open to act upon at any time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate recede from its action in putting the reciprocity repeal amendments on the metal schedule bill. Is the Senate ready for the question? The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. BRANDEGEE'S name was called). The Chair will state that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], but will transfer that pair to his colleague, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when the name of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming was called). My colleague [Mr. CLARK] is absent on business of the Senate, and he stands paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. CRANE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CRANE] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when Mr. GAMBLE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily absent. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS] and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when Mr. OWEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. OWEN] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired, however, with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] has a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present and free to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I would vote "yea" if I were not paired.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. I transfer that pair so that he may stand paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. The Senator from Mississippi is necessarily absent.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRAWFORD (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], and he being absent I feel compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to announce for the day that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Ashurst	Gore	Overman	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. SIMMONS's motion that the Senate recede from its amendments was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the Senate insist on its amendments Nos. 3 and 4, disagreed to by the House, and request a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. SIMMONS conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of House bill 24023, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 147.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] had offered an amendment striking out a certain part of the House text.

Mr. CLAPP. I had an amendment prepared, but the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] offered one last evening that I rather think is in better form.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I have improved on that a little.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 147, amend line 7 by striking out "thirty-four" and inserting "twenty-nine"; amend line 10 by striking out "two hundred and seventy-two thousand five hundred" and inserting "two hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred"; amend by substituting for lines 11, 12, 13, and 14 the following:

The five additional circuit court judgeships provided for by the act of Congress approved June 18, 1910, are hereby abolished, and the authority in said act of Congress for the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint five additional circuit judges is hereby repealed, and the number of circuit judges is hereby reduced to 29.

Mr. WARREN. I make the point of order against the amendment that it entirely changes existing law. These men are appointed for life or during good behavior, and hold their commissions and are in the service of the United States, under the law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I want to be heard. That is the very issue that is involved.

Mr. WARREN. I withhold my point of order for the moment, so that the Senator from Georgia may proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The proposed amendment of the committee strikes out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14 as found on page 147 of the bill. The bill as passed by the House provides that—

No circuit judge shall hereafter be appointed until the whole number of circuit judges shall be reduced to 29, and thereafter there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges.

I agree with the committee that that provision should be stricken out. It is based upon the idea that if a circuit court judge should die in any particular circuit, instead of the President appointing a new circuit court judge in that circuit one of these five judges is to be detailed to that circuit to do the work. I object to having one of these five judges detailed into our circuit. We have three good circuit court judges, and if a vacancy should arise we feel that we are entitled to have another circuit court judge appointed in that circuit from the bar of that circuit. Not one of these five men is from our circuit.

If the principle involved in the House provision is to prevail, then I think it would only be fair to limit its effect to the circuits from which these five men were appointed. If they desire to retain these men and reduce the number of circuit court judges as circuit court judges pass away, then the provision to be fair should be that in these circuits where the addition of these five men has increased the number no appointment shall be made until the number has been reduced to the normal number. But I do not think that these five men ought to be retained at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to say, in regard to the use of his language, they are not appointed to the circuits; they are appointed from them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no law authorizing the appointments from the circuit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that they are appointed from the circuits, but if they are to be assigned to regular circuit court judge work, then I want them to stick to the circuits that they live in and in which their appointments are made.

But I submit there is no necessity for that. We have dispensed with the court. We agree with the House that there shall be no Commerce Court, and there is, therefore, no necessity for these five additional circuit court judges. The five additional positions were created, not for the benefit of the general work but for this particular court. Five additional positions were created by the act of 1910, which created the Commerce Court.

Now, as we abolish the court we do not need the five additional positions any longer, and it is perfectly legal to abolish those five positions.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that no man appointed to an office has a vested right in his office. The legislative power can lessen the years of his office where there is no constitutional provision as to the time of the service. The legislative power can abolish the office. No vested right exists to draw the salary.

Congress, in 1910, created five additional positions, enlarging the number of circuit court judges to 34. It did it to provide for the detail of these five men to the Court of Commerce and for nothing else. We have abolished the Court of Commerce and there is no necessity for continuing the five positions.

The amendment which I have offered as a substitute for the House provision, agreeing with the committee that the House provision certainly ought to be disagreed to, simply provides that we shall repeal so much of the act of 1910 as created these five additional positions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question: The Supreme Court of the United States now consists of nine judges. It would be within the competence of Congress to provide that hereafter the Supreme Court of the United States shall consist of seven judges, but does the Senator from Georgia think that, in connection with that provision, we could abolish the last two Supreme Court judgeships and thereby legislate those two judges out of office?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will reply to the Senator by asking him a question: If we reduced the court to seven, could more than seven sit?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; but my position is, as implied by my question, that while we might reduce the number of the Supreme Court hereafter to seven members, we could not abolish the office of any one of those nine judges.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not prepared to say whether we could or could not. The Supreme Court stands upon a somewhat different position from the circuit courts, as it is undoubtedly a court provided for by the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, that is true, but only as respects the provision of the Constitution that there shall be a Supreme Court. There is no provision of the Constitution as to number.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator that my impression is that we could reduce the number, and, having abolished the places, that they would no longer hold their offices and no longer draw salaries. I do not express a fixed opinion upon it, but that is my impression about it. I do not see why it should not be the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Suppose we did reduce the number from nine to seven, could we not withhold the appropriation from them if we desired to do so?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps we have the physical power to do it; but we certainly have no right to do it under the Constitution, which provides that the salary of judges shall not be diminished during their term of office.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the office would have ceased to exist.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The office to which the judge was appointed would have ceased to exist.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, that constitutes the sole difference between the Senator and myself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think not. I think when the Constitution provides that the judges shall hold their offices during good behavior, that means that when a judgeship has been created that judge can not be separated from his office.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has been done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It never has been done but once, and that was in the very early history of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Sixteen circuit judges went out of office for good. Their office was abolished in 1802.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am quite familiar with that precedent, but I think it was condemned by the best lawyers in the country, and certainly by some of the leading constitutional text writers of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I feel no embarrassment whatever about legislation which wipes out an office. I entirely resent the idea that under our system of government there is any vested right in an office which any man can have. It is true that in the earlier days of the Republic some of our men, still fresh from English practice and English rule, entertained the idea of vested right in office gathered from the English practice, but gradually the courts of this country have entirely abandoned that. I do not believe that there is any supreme court in any of the States in the United States to-day that adheres to the idea that a man can have any vested right in office if the office is abolished by legislation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the right which the judge has in his office under the Constitution of the United States, as I understand, is not a right for the sake of the judge; it is not a vested right for his sake; but it is a right for the sake of the people. Whether their theory was right or wrong, they provided in the Constitution for the tenure of office during good behavior; and it was for their benefit, as they thought in framing the Constitution, and not for the benefit of the incumbent of the office—that is, it was for the benefit——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And that meant while the office existed. That certainly could not have meant when Congress created offices that were subsequently found to be useless the hands of the legislative power were to be tied and that these men should perpetually or, at least, during life continue to hold the offices, though the people, through their Representatives, believed that no longer was there a necessity or a desirability of maintaining the offices.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that there is no difference between the appointment of a man to an office that he is to hold during good behavior and the appointment of a man to an office that he is to hold for four years, so far as congressional or legislative action is concerned, within the period of four years, if that shall be the term of the office. It has been held a great many times in the United States that an office could be abolished and that the person holding it was thereby removed from the office during the term for which he was either appointed or elected. As I look at it, there is an office known as the office of circuit judge. It is entirely separate and apart from the circuit courts or the circuit court of appeals or the Commerce Court; and I can not believe that there is any constitutional difficulty in abolishing the office of such a judge. The consequence is, of course, that the person holding the office ceases to have any relation to the Government and ceases to be a circuit judge from that time on.

If the Senator from Utah will assert that in a State where an office has been created and a person appointed to it or elected to it for two years or four years, that office can not be abolished during the time to which such person was elected to it, then he will support the proposition which I understand he makes; but I think, in view of the authorities, he will not so assert.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire, Mr. President, to protract the debate on this question. I have presented an amendment which meets the proposition of reducing the number of circuit judges to 29, and repealing so much of the act of 1910 as created 5 additional circuit judges. That we can legally reduce the number it seems to me is perfectly clear. I think that is the simple way to handle the subject.

The additional amendments I have offered follow the one which would substitute for the action of the committee in simply striking out from line 11 to line 14, as passed by the other House, and in their place inserting the provision to the effect which I have stated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, so far as the point of order made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is concerned, it seems to me to be absolutely well taken. The provision of law under which these five judges are now in office is as follows:

> The President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five additional circuit judges, no two of whom shall be from the same judicial circuit, who shall hold office during good behavior and who shall be from time to time designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States for service in the circuit court for any district, or the circuit court of appeals for any circuit, or in the Commerce Court.

The existing law, therefore, is that these five judges have been appointed during good behavior. If no change is made in existing law, of course they continue to hold those offices. So it is manifest that the proposition made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is to radically change existing law.

Independently, however, of the question of order and upon the merits of this proposition, I contend that Congress has no power to do this thing, even if it were presented by a separate bill. Let me again advert to the provisions under which these judges were appointed.

In the first place, the Commerce Court act provided that a court of the United States should be created called the Commerce Court; that that court should be composed of five judges, to be from time to time designated and assigned thereto by the Chief Justice of the United States from among the circuit judges of the United States. But the act further provided that as at first constituted the court should consist of these five additional circuit judges. Then provision was made as to how these five judges should be appointed. They were to be appointed by the President of the United States as circuit judges. It is true they are called additional circuit judges, but the word "additional" is no part of the title. It is simply descriptive; it means the same as though it had read "there shall be appointed five circuit judges, who shall be in addition to the judges already in office."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's position is, then, that if we do in time increase the number of any branch of the Federal court judiciary who hold for life, we could never subsequently decrease them?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We never can decrease them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. During the lives of the men?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is precisely my position. We have no right to decrease them. We may decrease the number of judges, but we must provide, as the House provided—and I will undertake to say after due consideration:

> No circuit judge shall hereafter be appointed until the whole number of circuit judges shall be reduced to 29, and thereafter there shall not be more than 29 circuit judges.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was done in the act of 1866.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has been done several times.

Mr. HEYBURN. The act of 1863 increased the court to nine associates and the Chief Justice. Under that Justice Field came in. Then, in 1866, Congress provided that no other Supreme Court judge should be appointed until the number had been reduced to six Associate Justices and one Chief Justice.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That has been done.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the House evidently followed that precedent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely. That has been the uniform legislation with reference to this matter, except in the case to which the Senator from Georgia adverted, in 1802. Congress has on two or three occasions altered the number of judges who should constitute the Supreme Court of the United States. It has on two or three occasions reduced the number. It reduced them upon one occasion from 9 to 7. It reduced them upon another occasion from 10 to 9; but in each instance where it undertook to do that express provision was made that that should not interfere with the tenure of the existing judges. In other words, until one of the judges should have passed away or resigned or gone out of office in some way provided by the Constitution—having reached the age limit and retired, for example—Congress recognized that he could not be deprived of his office, and continued him in his office, and the provision for the number of the judges to be decreased went into operation after, in the natural course of things, the number of judges had been reduced.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not want to cut off argument, if it is in order, but I want now to make the point of order for the Chair to rule upon, that no matter what might properly be the changes in legislation, certainly an appropriation bill is not open to amendments to be offered that have neither been estimated for, nor have they been heretofore presented, printed, and laid over for a day, nor have they been reported from any committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to continue for a few moments to state my position upon this matter. I think it is a question of great importance.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the point of order suggested by the Senator from Wyoming is ruled upon, I desire to be heard upon it.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the point of order is open to discussion as to the point of order itself.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Utah for that purpose now.

Mr. WARREN. I do not claim that those are the only points of order that can be made against the amendment, but I make those for the Chair to consider. Of course, remarks on the point of order are in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, Mr. President, the office of the judge must be distinguished from the court, which is not an office, but a place or an institution for the exercise of the office of the judge. The Commerce Court exists wholly independent of any particular judges. We could provide that these circuit judges should no longer serve in the Commerce Court, but that district judges should be appointed; we could provide for the employment of entirely new judges to serve upon the Commerce Court; and so with reference to the other courts. Not very long ago we abolished the circuit courts of the United States, transferring their jurisdiction to the district courts of the United States, but we did not thereby abolish the circuit judges any more than we would abolish the district judge by abolishing the district court, or any more than we would abolish the Supreme Court by abolishing the circuit courts, in which the Supreme Court judges were authorized to sit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was because you needed them on the circuit courts of appeal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But wholly independent of the question of what we needed, I am saying that the act of legislation abolishing the circuit courts did not abolish the circuit judges. I am undertaking to point out that the office of judge is wholly separate and distinct from the court. The Constitution, as I have said, provides that the judges, whether they are Supreme Court judges or judges of the inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior. By that provision, as I understand, it was intended that the judge should not be separated from his office nor the office from the judge in such a way that he should cease to be a judge; otherwise the whole purpose of the Constitution, so far as that part of it is concerned, would, as I view it, be utterly subverted. The idea of that was that these judges should have a permanency of tenure and not be subject to removal by the President of the United States, who appointed them, nor by the legislative body which authorized their appointment. It was intended that they should be entirely independent, so far as their tenure of office was concerned, of everybody. Congress was simply designated as an agent of the people to provide for these courts, as the President was designated as the agent of the people to make the appointment of the judges; but when the authority was given by Congress for the creation of these offices, and the President of the United States had filled them, both Congress and the President ceased to have any control over their tenure of office. It was further emphasized——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will bear with me a moment, that thought was further emphasized by the provision in the Constitution that the salaries of the judges should not be reduced. The underlying thought in both propositions was that the court should be entirely independent of Congress, so that their judgment should not be swayed in any manner by the opinions of Congress upon any matters that might come before them; that they might be wholly independent; that their judgment might not be altered or swayed in the slightest degree by the fear that, if they did not decide in a particular way, Congress could step in and remove them from the office, or that Congress could step in and take away their salary or cut it down.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Within my recollection in the Senate there have been two courts abolished, and the judges have been abolished, their salaries being unappropriated for.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What judges?

Mr. OVERMAN. I refer to the Spanish Claims Commission, here in the city, and then there was a land court to pass on Mexican claims out in the West.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were not constitutional courts.

Mr. OVERMAN. I remember a judge from my State who was appointed——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were not constitutional courts.

Mr. OVERMAN. All courts are constitutional courts, in that Congress is allowed to create such courts as it may from time to time think necessary. The circuit courts are not provided for in the Constitution; only the Supreme Court of the United States is provided for in the Constitution. Therefore, any court that we create is subject, as I claim, to be abolished, except the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no, Mr. President; there is a very clear and a very vital distinction. The judges of the courts created by the Constitution hold their office during good behavior. That does not mean that Congress may not create other courts. Congress provided for courts in the Territories and fixed their term of office at four years. The Supreme Court held that they did not exercise any of the judicial power of the Constitution; that they were not constitutional courts, but legislative courts.

Mr. OVERMAN. The time of the courts to which I have referred was not fixed. What is the distinction between those courts and any other courts established by Congress? They are all legislative courts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were appointed for a special purpose. It is true they exercised judicial functions, but they did not exercise the judicial power of the Constitution. That distinction is very well understood. We provide for the appointment of commissioners of the circuit courts. Those commissioners exercise judicial functions, but it has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court and by the subordinate Federal courts that they do not exercise any of the judicial power of the Constitution, and they are not constitutional courts, although they exercise judicial functions. So with special boards or courts, or whatever we may call them.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Was not the court in the District of Columbia which was abolished in March, 1863, a constitutional court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at all. The judges of the courts of the District of Columbia are not appointed under the judicial clause of the Constitution at all; they are appointed under the provisions of the Constitution which gives Congress authority to govern the District of Columbia, just as the judges in the Territories are appointed under that provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the—power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

They are not appointed under the judicial clause of the Constitution at all.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator claim that, outside of what force may attach to the provision that a judge's salary shall not be decreased, the term of office of a judge whom he calls a "constitutional judge" is any more beyond the reach of Congress than that of any other officer?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is precisely what I am claiming.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to have the Senator answer the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, which, it seems to me, is absolutely unanswerable——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I thought I was answering it.

Mr. CLAPP. That it makes no difference whether that term is indeterminate or fixed, we could abolish it in either case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think so, because I think, as I have been undertaking to show, that the Constitution of the United States contemplated that these judges should hold their offices during good behavior and should not be subject to removal. No power is given——

Mr. CLAPP. Suppose it had said "10 years" instead of "during good behavior"?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, I think that might have made some difference, but that is not the case we are dealing with.

Mr. CLAPP. The one determines just as much as the other.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think so.

Mr. CLAPP. If it would be 10 years, it would be 10 years, and if it is during good behavior it is during good behavior; and if we could terminate the one we certainly may terminate the other, it seems to me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not agree with the Senator; I do not think we can, because the purpose of the Constitution with reference to the permanency of these judges is to be borne in mind.

I was going to say that in 1802—and that is the only piece of legislation that I know of where anything of this sort has ever been attempted—in 1802 Congress, after a most illuminating discussion and after devoting some weeks of time to the discussion, by an act abolished the 16 circuit courts that had been created the year previous. It was done, as I think historians practically all agree, as a matter of politics. The outgoing administration, under President Adams, had provided for these 16 circuits, and the judges for them had been appointed. The incoming administration, under Mr. Jefferson, was very much disturbed about it, and a bill was immediately presented upon the incoming of Congress to repeal the previous act, and after discussion it was repealed.

Now, I want to call attention—and with those citations I am through, for I have no desire to prolong the discussion—to what was said by Mr. Justice Story, who in point of time was pretty close to that particular incident. At section 1632 of his work on the Constitution, Mr. Justice Story says——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, for information, I will ask what was the result as to the tenure of office of these Federal judges.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress abolished the court and, as I remember—although I am not entirely clear about it—they undertook to provide, as well, that the judges should not serve.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What was the result of that? Did those judges go out of office?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The result was that there was no way of presenting the matter—that is, no way by which the judges themselves could present it, as I understand—and the matter never was determined by the Supreme Court.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To what case is the Senator referring?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am referring to the legislation of 1802, which undertook to abolish the circuit courts that had been created the year prior.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But they did not abolish the circuit courts. They abolished the office of circuit-court judge as a distinct office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The circuit judges or the circuit court——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They abolished the 16 judges, and the judges applied to Congress later on for their pay, which was denied them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; they applied to Congress.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does not the Senator think, if there had been a remedy in case they had desired to question the right of Congress to abolish their offices and legislate them out of office by legislating the court out of existence, that they would have applied to the court and had the constitutionality of the matter determined by the court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, I do not know——

Mr. POINDEXTER. The fact that they did not do so rather indicates, in my judgment, that there simply was no question about the authority of Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The judges did not assent to it, because they applied to Congress, asking Congress to assign them to their duties, insisting that they were still judges, but that there was nothing for them to do. I can not myself just see what they could have done in the way of appealing to the court.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did their pay go on?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; their pay did not go on.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator contend that we could not abolish the office of circuit court judge or circuit court judge of appeals and abolish all 34 places, doing away with these judges entirely?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do so contend. The Senator has asked me that question before.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I never asked the Senator that question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, he has asked me a question equivalent to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I carried it a little further this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do so contend. The whole purpose for which I am now standing on my feet is to make that contention. Let me in turn suggest to the Senator that if we may abolish the 34 circuit judges, then we can abolish the 93 district judges, and we can abolish all other judges and provide for the appointment of other judges in their places. I do not think that any such contingency as that was ever contemplated by the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My former question to the Senator was, Did he contend that we could not abolish five of these places and get rid of these judges in that way? I extended the question the last time to the entire 34, covering the entire jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, it must necessarily follow, if I contend that the 5 can not be abolished, that I also contend that 34 can not be abolished.

In section 1632, Mr. Story says:

Mr. Justice Wilson also has, with manifest satisfaction, referred to the provision as giving a decided superiority to the national judges over those of England.

This is a quotation from Mr. Justice Wilson:

The laws—

Says he—

in England respecting the independency of the judges have been construed as confined to those in the superior courts. In the United States this independency extends to judges in courts inferior as well as supreme. This independency reaches equally their salaries and their commissions. In England the judges of the superior courts do not now, as they did formerly, hold their commissions and their salaries at the pleasure of the Crown, but they still hold them at the pleasure of the Parliament.

That is because there is an express provision.

The judicial subsists, and may be blown to annihilation by the breath of the legislative department.

That is in England.

In the United States the judges stand upon the sure basis of the Constitution; the judicial department is independent of the department of legislature. No act of Congress can shake their commissions or reduce their salaries. "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." It is not lawful for the President of the United States to remove them on the address of the two Houses of Congress. They may be removed, however, as they ought to be, on conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors. The judges of the United States stand on a much more independent footing than that on which the judges of England stand, with regard to jurisdiction as well as with regard to commissions and salaries. In many cases the jurisdiction of the judges of the United States is ascertained and secured by the Constitution. As to these, the power of the judicial is coordinate with that of the legislative department. As to the other cases, by the necessary result of the Constitution, the authority of the former is paramount to the authority of the latter.

Now, in the next section he proceeds:

It would be a matter of general congratulation if this language had been completely borne out by the perusal of our judicial annals, but, unfortunately, a measure was adopted in 1802, under the auspices of President Jefferson, which, if its constitutionality can be successfully vindicated, prostrates in the dust the independence of all inferior judges, both as to the tenure of their office and their compensation for services, and leaves the Constitution a miserable and vain delusion. In the year 1801 Congress passed an act reorganizing the judiciary and authorizing the appointment of 16 new judges, with suitable salaries, to hold the circuit courts of the United States in the different circuits created by the act. Under this act the circuit judges received their appointments and performed the duties of their offices until the year 1802, when the courts established by the act were abolished by a general repeal of it by Congress without in the slightest manner providing for the payment of the salaries of the judges or for any continuation of their offices. The result of this act, therefore, is, so far as it is a precedent, that, notwithstanding the constitutional tenure of office of the judges of the inferior courts is during good behavior, Congress may, at any time, by a mere act of legislation, deprive them of their offices at pleasure, and with it take away their whole title to their salaries. How this can be reconciled with the terms or the intent of the Constitution is more than any ingenuity of argument has ever, as yet, been able to demonstrate. The system fell, because it was unpopular with those who were then in possession of power, and the victims have hitherto remained without any indemnity from the justice of the Government.

And in a note to that section the author says:

The act gave rise to one of the most animated debates to be found in the annals of Congress, and was resisted by a power of argument and eloquence which has never been surpassed. These debates were collected and printed in a volume at Albany in 1802, and are worthy of the most deliberate perusal of every constitutional lawyer. The act may be asserted, without fear of contradiction, to have been against the opinion of a great majority of all the ablest lawyers at the time, and probably now, when the passions of the day have subsided, few lawyers will be found to maintain the constitutionality of the act. No one can doubt the perfect authority of Congress to remodel their courts or to confer or withdraw their jurisdiction at their pleasure. But the question is whether they can deprive judges of the tenure of their office and their salaries after they have once become constitutionally vested in them.

And Mr. Tucker, an able authority, in the course of a discussion of this subject in the appendix to the first volume of his edition of Blackstone, commenting upon this same matter, says——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question? Does he not think it is within the power of Congress to repeal the act creating the court and providing for these judges—absolutely, the whole act?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does not the Senator think it is within the power of Congress to repeal the act creating the Commerce Court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think we have the power to do that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would not the effect of that be to do away with the judges appointed under that act?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at all, and I am strengthened in my position in this particular instance by the fact that these judges are not appointed as judges of the Commerce Court. They are appointed as circuit judges and the act which provides for their appointment expressly provides that they may serve in the circuit courts of appeals and in the circuit courts.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the act of 1910, instead of providing for the appointment of five additional circuit judges, had provided for the appointment of five judges of the Commerce Court. The Senator from Utah has expressed the opinion, about which I think there can be no doubt, that it is within our power to abolish the Commerce Court. Under that hypothesis, what would then have become of the judges?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The judges would have been judges. They would have been entitled to receive their salaries, because the office of the judge, under the terms of the Constitution, had vested in them during good behavior. That, if it means anything, means that they can not be divested of their office except for misbehavior. They would have been judges without Congress having assigned any duties to them, but Congress could have done so at any time.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator says they would have been judges, but judges of what?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Judges without duties.

Mr. CUMMINS. Judges of what court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Judges of no court, but judges entitled to receive their compensation.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator take the position that there can be judges without a court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been undertaking to say that there may be; that we may abolish a court——

Mr. BACON. I understood what the Senator said necessarily involved that and led to it, but I did not know that the Senator had announced it as a distinct proposition that there may be a judge without a court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the distinct position——

Mr. BACON. Or without any law authorizing a court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the distinct position taken by the authorities I am quoting. That is Mr. Story's position.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it a fact that one of the judges of the Commerce Court at the time of his appointment was a judge of a United States district court appointed for life?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then we abolished that office which he held.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He accepted the other office.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did he resign?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know what he did, but he accepted the other office.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unless he resigned, he is now two judges.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think we could have taken him out of his office without his consent?

Mr. HEYBURN. We just deliberately appointed him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I know; but suppose he had declined the appointment.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is supposable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is a legitimate supposition. Suppose the judge, who was then a district judge, and had been appointed a circuit judge, had declined to accept the office of circuit judge. Would he not have continued in his office of district judge?

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to suggest, in order to keep the record straight, that there were two of these judges who were upon the district bench at the time they were appointed to the Commerce Court.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; there was one other. I did not want to mention names.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can not see how that in any manner militates against the argument I am making. The judges who were serving as district judges could not have been taken out of their positions without their consent. The President saw fit to appoint them—if there was more than one—to the office of circuit judge.

Mr. HEYBURN. In what form?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By accepting the office. I am reminded that one of the judges who was appointed declined to serve. That was a judge in Michigan. He refused the appointment.

Mr. HEYBURN. How would a United States district judge, appointed for life, get out of office through any action taken by Congress or the President? It must be by his own action.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did he resign?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He gave up his office by accepting the other.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not resignation. He may have abandoned his office, but did he resign? If he did not resign, having been appointed United States district judge for life, he must still be a United States district judge for life.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suppose his accepting another judicial appointment of a higher grade necessarily would amount to an abandonment of that office.

Now, let me read this quotation from Tucker, page 359 of the first volume:

> That absolute independence of the judiciary for which we contend is not, then, incompatible with the strictest responsibility (for a judge is no more exempt from it than any other servant of the people, according to the true principles of the Constitution), but such an independence of the other coordinate branches of the Government as seems absolutely necessary to secure to them the free exercise of their constitutional functions without the hope of pleasing or the fear of offending. And as from the natural feebleness of the judiciary it is in continual jeopardy of being overpowered, awed, or influenced by its coordinate branches, who have the custody of the purse and sword of the confederacy; and as nothing can contribute so much to its firmness and independence as permanancy in office, this quality therefore may be justly regarded as an indispensable ingredient in its Constitution, and in great measure as the citadel of the public justice and the public security. Nor was it imagined that there was more than one opinion upon this subject in the United States until a recent event proved the contrary. It was supposed that there could not be a doubt that those tribunals in which justice is to be dispensed according to the Constitution and laws of the confederacy; in which life, liberty, and property are to be decided upon; in which questions might arise as to the constitutional powers of the Executive, or the constitutional obligation of an act of the Legislature; and in the decision of which the judges might find themselves constrained by duty and by their oaths to pronounce against the authority of either should be stable and permanent and not dependent upon the will of the Executive or Legislature, or both, for their existence. That without this degree of permanence the tenure of office during good behavior could not secure to that department the necessary firmness to meet unshaken every question and to decide as justice and the Constitution should dictate without regard to consequences. These considerations induced an opinion which it was presumed was general, if not universal, that the power vested in Congress to erect from time to time tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court did not authorize them, at pleasure, to demolish them. Being built upon the rock of the Constitution, their foundations were supposed to partake of its permanency and to be equally incapable of being shaken by the other branches of the Government. But a different construction of the Constitution has lately prevailed; it has been determined that a power to ordain and establish from time to time carries with it a discretionary power to discontinue or demolish; that although the tenure of office be during good behavior, this does not prevent the separation of the office from the officer by putting down the office, but only secures to the officer his station upon the terms of good behavior so long as the office itself remains. * * * Painful, indeed, is the remark that this interpretation seems calculated to subvert one of the fundamental pillars of free governments, and to have laid the foundation of one of the most dangerous political schisms that has ever happened in the United States of America.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah how he reconciles what he has read from Story and from Tucker with his advocacy of the abolition of the circuit courts?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does not disagree with my position upon that matter.

Mr. BACON. As I understood the contention of the Senator, it is that Congress, while it has the power to create a court, when it has once created it has lost the power over it and it becomes a permanency, and that thereafter Congress can not repeal the law creating the court and can not thereby abolish that court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think this, Mr. President. I perhaps did not state my position as fully as I should have done.

My position about it is that when Congress has created a court and provided for judges, Congress has the power to abolish that court, but I think it must eo instanti confer the duties of that court upon some other court, as was done in the case of the circuit courts of the United States. It is true we abolished the circuit courts, but in the same act, eo instanti, we vested in the district courts all of the powers and authority of the circuit courts, and we did not in any manner disturb the tenure of the circuit judges. I think we had a right to do that. I think we have a right to abolish the Commerce Court provided we confer upon some other tribunal the duties and the powers of the Commerce Court, which we have undertaken to do.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, of course the power to create the Commerce Court or any other court is found in that clause of the Constitution which, after providing for the Supreme Court, authorizes Congress to create any other inferior courts that it may think proper and desirable. That is true, is it not? There is no distinction in that case, as to the power, between its exercise in the creation of a circuit court and its exercise in the creation of the Commerce Court.

The proposition of the Senator is that having once created a court, although the purpose for which it was created may have been accomplished and there may be no further use for it, or although it may develop that the purpose for which the court was created was mistaken in its contemplation as to its results, Congress is powerless to abolish the court unless it confers its powers on some other tribunal.

As a matter of law, there is no more necessity in one case than in another of conferring the powers of a court upon some other tribunal, because whether or not those powers shall continue to be exercised by any court is a question of judgment. In the judgment of Congress the occasion may arise when it would be a question whether those powers properly should be perpetuated and conferred upon some other court, or whether they should be taken away altogether and not exercised by any court. That is certainly a legitimate thing for Congress to consider and to determine.

That brings me to the point I am coming to: That occasions do arise when Congress creates courts and appoints judges that are for a temporary purpose. But if the contention of the Senator is correct, when that temporary purpose has been accomplished, even although the court is to be dispensed with, the inalienable right of a judge to his office and to his salary is such that while there is no further use for him he must be perpetuated in office.

I will give an illustration: Some 12 years ago Congress created the Court of Spanish Claims. That was for the accomplishment of a particular purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator claim that that was a court possessing judicial powers under the Constitution?

Mr. BACON. It was one of the inferior courts, and there is no distinction. There is no court that Congress creates that is not created under the judicial clause of the Constitution. It may create courts which have higher dignity in some cases than in others. It may create courts which it designs to be permanent, as it did design in the creation of the circuit courts, but which, in a large measure, the Senator was influential in destroying by insisting upon the abolition of the circuit courts against my protest.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator passes from that point, let me ask him this question: Do I understand the Senator to say that Congress is powerless to provide for a court that does not owe its existence to the judicial clause of the Constitution?

Mr. BACON. I do not think Congress can create any court without deriving its power to create it from the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress created the courts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They certainly were not created under the judicial clause.

Mr. BACON. That was under an altogether different clause of the Constitution.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to ask who has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Surely.

Mr. WARREN. With all respect, Mr. President, of course I am helpless; but a point of order has been raised here that need not bring in any of these constitutional questions, and I will ask if the Chair is ready to rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Wyoming to listen to me for a moment. I have the floor. I do not occupy the floor very often, and I am going to occupy it until I finish.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is no occasion for the temper shown by the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Wyoming has twice suggested that the Chair ought to rule on the point of order, and that the Senator from Utah ought to cease speaking.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Utah can indulge in that if he likes; but I submit to him whether, after sitting here for nine days under attacks, I ought not at least to have a right to ask him to listen to a suggestion made in the most respectful way and with the greatest kindness. Having made a point of order I am entitled to a ruling, and the only debate permissible meantime would be on the question of order as challenged.

If I have sinned against the Senator from Utah, I will beg his pardon, but I do not see it in that light.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Wyoming did not make any suggestion to me. The Senator from Wyoming has twice interrupted me to ask the Chair whether he was ready to rule upon this question.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. That would not have taken the Senator off the floor, however.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would not have yielded to the Senator from Wyoming to make any such inquiry. I supposed the Senator wanted to ask me something.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, in addition to what I have said, that Congress has provided for appointing the courts in the various territories. That is not under the judiciary clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. They are created under an altogether different clause.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress has also provided for appointing commissioners of courts to exercise judicial functions. So it seems to me it is hardly accurate for the Senator from Georgia to say that any court created by Congress must be created under the judiciary clause.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator misunderstood me. Of course, when I say that I am speaking of national courts. I am not speaking of the District of Columbia. Congress is expressly given absolute and unqualified power over everything that relates to the District. I am not speaking of the Territories, where there is the exercise of a similar power under the Constitution. The principle is an altogether different one.

I am not speaking of either Territorial courts or courts in the District of Columbia. I wish to say to the Senator that I have had reference solely to courts which may be said to be national in their character—that is, they are for national purposes—outside of the particular localities mentioned by me.

I repeat the suggestion and the expression of opinion which I made, that no inferior court of that character is created by Congress except a court the power to create which is derived from the clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the authority to create inferior courts. It was for that reason, if the Senator will pardon me a second, that I ventured the conclusion that the contention of the Senator could not be correct—that after having created a court Congress could not abolish it without conferring its powers on some other court.

I came to that conclusion for the reasons I have mentioned. In the first place, the purpose for which the court was originally created may have been accomplished and there may be no further need for it. I say that if a court of that kind had been created, and there had been no limitation set either upon the life of the court or the tenure of office of the judge, whenever Congress came to the conclusion that the time had arrived when the court had accomplished the purpose for which it was created and abolished it, the judge necessarily would go with it.

I do not want to interrupt the Senator unduly. I want to say, however, if he will pardon me, that the Senator may remember that when the act which abolished the circuit courts was before the Senate I contended that to do so would be to vacate the offices of the circuit judges. I have no question in my mind as to the correctness of that conclusion, except upon one possible suggestion, and that is that prior to the abolition of the circuit courts there had been additional jurisdiction conferred upon those judges, and therefore that while the circuit courts were eo nomine abolished the particular duties which they performed had not been abolished in entirety. That is the only ground upon which, in my opinion, it can be maintained to-day that the abolition of the circuit courts of the United States did not abolish the office of every circuit judge in the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, of course I regret that the Senator from Georgia does not agree with my position on this matter. But my regret is somewhat tempered by the thought that two very distinguished writers upon the Constitution do agree with me.

That is all I care to say upon this matter, Mr. President, except, in conclusion——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one question. Throughout his speech he has maintained that Congress has not the power to withdraw jurisdiction from one court without giving it to another court. I think the Senator will scarcely insist upon that. He will admit, I take it, that all the Federal courts—the district courts and the circuit courts—were created by act of Congress. Every court except the Supreme Court of the United States was created by act of Congress. The jurisdiction of the district courts and the jurisdiction of the circuit courts depend upon the act of Congress, and the legislative power can deprive any of these courts of all their jurisdiction. Will not the Senator concede that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator means by that that they can be abolished, I will answer "no."

Mr. FLETCHER. I mean that it is in the power of Congress to deprive either the Commerce Court or the district court or the circuit court of all its jurisdiction without conferring it on any other court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not want to enter into a discussion of that question; but I very much doubt whether Congress could deprive all the courts of the United States of all jurisdiction in all cases, leaving no courts open to any person who had a right of action under the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. In that connection, if the Senator will allow me, I will refer to the case of Ex parte Wisner, 203 United States, where Chief Justice Fuller says:

> The Supreme Court alone possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the Constitution and of which the legislative power can not deprive it; but the jurisdiction of the circuit courts depends upon some act of Congress.
